LAST MINUTE NEWS

Volvo, Texas near agreement

AUSTIN, Texas—The Texas attorney general and Volvo today are expected to agree to a settlement in state district court here requiring the Swedish car importer to withdraw TV and print advertising the state claimed was a hoax. The TV spot and magazine spread showed a Volvo relatively intact after a monster truck car-crushing competition that was filmed here in June. The investigation focused on allegations that Volvo rigged its car with steel reinforcements while weakening competitors' vehicles. Clyde Farrell, chief of the consumer protection division in the attorney general's office, said Volvo would run a corrective ad and pay the state $316,250 in investigative costs. The corrective ad, an open letter to Texas residents signed by Volvo President-CEO Joseph L. Nicolato, claims the film production company made the changes in the cars without Volvo's knowledge. Scali, McCabe, Sloves, New York, Volvo's agency, wasn't named as a defendant in the case.

Sky TV, BSB to merge

LONDON—Rupert Murdoch's Sky Television satellite service will merge with rival British Satellite Broadcasting, a Sky spokeswoman here said Friday. The new company, to be called British Sky Broadcasting, will be a 50/50 joint venture between Mr. Murdoch's News International and current BSB shareholders. The combined service will have five channels,

'News' losing ads as strike takes hold

By Scott Donaton and Alison Fahey

NEW YORK—Skittish advertisers last week began pulling out of the embattled Daily News and beefing up spending in rival New York tabloids and radio as the strike against the paper moved into its second week.

The Tribune Co. paper, the nation's third-largest metropolitan daily, on Friday faced hostile strikers and union sympathizers who crowded around the Daily News building. The paper has been publishing since the strike began Oct. 25 but is suffering from circulation shortfalls due to strike-related distribution problems.

Daily News management and its nine striking unions offered sharply different accounts of the effects of the strike and a union-organized advertiser boycott on the paper last week.

A Daily News spokeswoman said advertiser support remained steady

"If [retailers] don't get . . . assurances . . . they are going to start pulling their bucks out."

but union representatives claimed that more than 70 retailers and marketers had yanked their ads.

The strike-produced newspaper remained fat with ads as the Daily News adjusted its ad rates to reflect circulation declines. Still, some advertisers—worried by union claims that as few as 200,000 copies of the 71-year-old paper were getting into readers hands or in a show of support for the unions—slashed spending in the News. The News' usual circulation is just over 1 million.

Daily News management "keeps telling us what they're printing, but I'm concerned with what the actual distribution and sales are," said Jack Cohen, VP-print/outdoor media buying for DDB Needham Worldwide. Mr. Cohen said the agency yanked schedules for two of its clients since the strike began but declined to name them.

Herman's World of Sporting Goods said it had pulled advertising from the News "until they straighten out their

Agencies whittle staffs

Ayer to cut 10% as poor economy jabs industry

By Gary Levin and Jon Lafayette

In a sign that times are only getting tougher, several major ad agencies are restructuring managements and cutting staffs as they try to cope in a recessionary environment.

Following a trend set by many of their clients, both large and small shops are rethinking how to improve performance in leaner times while maintaining their financial footing.

Ogilvy & Mather, New York, and N W Ayer this week will announce major staff changes designed to streamline and operate more efficiently, agency sources said.

At O&M, four creative directors and four group account directors will be named to new executive-level positions, reducing the number of people who report to North American President Julian Clopet (see story on Page 70).

Ayer is planning a 10% staff cut throughout its offices and will revamp its New York creative department by moving Patrick Cunningham, exec VP-chief creative officer, to a new worldwide slot. He will be replaced by two co-creative directors, whom sources identified as Keith Gould, now an exec VP, and Susan Read, currently an exec VP-executive creative director at Lintas:New York.

Sources also said Stanley Mattison, New York-based president-international and exec VP-administrative services for the parent company, is leaving.

Lesser changes are expected on the account management side, where Rodger Groves, one of four executive account directors, resigned to join J. Walter Thompson USA, New York.

Ayer confirmed Mattison's departure but would not confirm the other staff moves. The agency denied staffing cutbacks would amount to 10%.

Bozell this week also is expected to 'Dances' joins film efforts to target ads

By Marcy Magiera

MOVIE MARKETING

Orion Pictures is jumping on the trend toward narrowly targeted movie marketing with its newest release, "Dances With Wolves," the epic western from star Kevin Costner.

For "Dances With Wolves," about a young soldier torn between the Union army and the Sioux tribe, Orion is launching a radio campaign in several American Indian languages.

A portion of dialogue in "Dances With Wolves" is spoken in the Lakota Sioux language, with English subtitles. The film opens on a limited basis Nov. 9 and nationally Nov. 21.

Warner Bros., 20th Century Fox Film Corp. and Universal Pictures have recently used targeted direct mail campaigns to give films an extra push with a particular group of consumers likely to see a new movie.

Orion and Paramount Pictures Corp. are showing film trailers in places other than movie theaters —on college campuses, in video stores and on TV screens at consumer electronics retailers.

Studios are being attracted to non-traditional media to differentiate themselves and the films, said Simon Kornblit, Universal's exec VP-worldwide marketing.

"Just [like] the way you want to be different with creative, now we're trying to be different with media," Mr. Kornblit said.

"Dances With Wolves" is the kind of film that may have a tough time finding an audience in a holiday season packed with more commercial films, Hollywood observers say.

Though Mr. Costner, who also co-produces and directs, has considerable box office drawing power, the film's 3-hour length and genre may discourage some moviegoers. That's where target

Green standards

States' report urges uniform federal guidelines

By Jennifer Lawrence

A multistate task force this week plans to unveil the first set of recommendations on environmental marketing claims.

The 50-page report is expected to be made public Nov. 8 and aims to encourage advertisers to adopt uniform guidelines when promoting green product benefits.

Although the 10-state task force will seek marketers' comments on the report, its publication nevertheless gives notice to marketers that certain green claims are considered misleading under state deceptive-ad-practices laws.

The document urges the federal government to develop national standards to define environmental claims. The states hope this report will lay the foundation for such standards.

Such development at the federal level appears stalled, meaning the states are likely to vigorously regulate green claims in the absence of federal initiative. Multistate investigations on green marketing claims have been under way since January.

"From the FTC's viewpoint, the commissioners have not yet decided if [green] guidelines are necessary," said Lee Peeler, associate director for advertising practices at the Federal Trade Commission's Consumer Protection Bureau. "All that has happened is that [Environmental Protection Agency Director William] Reilly said he would come to us and discuss it. We've both followed up, but there's nothing formal."

The report from the state attorneys general is said to be in three sections. The first is an overview of why the state attorneys general and federal agencies have become interested in examining environmental ad claims; the second summarizes testimony at a public forum on the subject held in St. Paul, Minn., in March.

The third and most important section provides general recommendations about the use of such terms as "ozone friendly," "biodegradable," "photodegradable," "recyclable" and "recycled." It also calls for developing a national regulatory scheme for environmental claims.

The multistate task force is being led by Minnesota Attorney General Hubert Humphrey III and his staff. The other nine participating states include officials from California, Florida, Massachusetts, Missouri, New York, Texas, Washington, Wisconsin and Utah.

"We prefer that these recommendations not be called guidelines," said Julie Vergeront, Minnesota special assistant attorney general. "Guideline is a loaded word. Instead, these are broad principles to provide interim guidance."

Ms. Vergeront said the states see the need for some companies to change their environmental claims, adding, "We feel there is confusion out there. The report provides an indication of practices we find troublesome."

Already, seven states have sued Mobil Chemical Co. for alleged deceptive degradable claims for its Hefty trash bags. Mobil settled with Texas and the other six suits are in litigation. About six other companies are under investigation for possible false green claims.

Ms. Vergeront emphasized the report will be distributed to marketers to obtain their comments.

The task force intends to avoid the problems associated with the National Association of Attorneys General air-fare ad guidelines distributed three years ago. In developing those national ad standards, NAAG angered marketers and ad industry groups that felt the federal government should set such standards. The courts upheld that view in the case of airline ad regulation (AA, Oct. 8). □

Shops shun L.A. Gear

By Marcy Magiera

L.A. Gear, already earning the reputation as a difficult client, is being dubbed "the Gallo of the south" by some California agency executives.

L.A. Gear has approached numerous agencies about handling the creative portion of its $68 million ad and promotion account. But by press time, the number of agencies that had declined to participate in the review outnumbered those that were planning to take part.

Los Angeles agencies Ketchum Advertising, Dailey & Associates and Rubin Postaer & Associates, as well as Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein, San Francisco, are believed to have refused L.A. Gear's offer to pitch.

BBDO Worldwide, Los Angeles, and San Francisco shops Goldberg Moser O'Neill and Mandelbaum Mooney Ashley are the only agencies that will definitely present speculative creative to L.A. Gear executives in mid-November.

Creative presentations will focus on a Super Bowl spot to introduce the athletic shoe marketer's Catapult technology, an L.A. Gear source said.

L.A. Gear late last week was still trying to persuade Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco, and Fallon McElligott, Minneapolis, to take part in the review.

Foote, Cone & Belding and D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, both Los Angeles, have also asked to be included in the review, but no decision has been made about letting them pitch. FCB's relationship with Levi Strauss & Co. is likely to keep the agency from participating, however. Besides athletic shoes, L.A. Gear also markets apparel.

Agency executives, many of whom said they couldn't be quoted about L.A. Gear because they had signed non-disclosure agreements with the marketer, are wary of the L.A. Gear account.

They're concerned that Exec VP Sandy Saemann, who in the past has created L.A. Gear's ads almost single-handedly, won't relinquish any creative control to an agency.

"I think they're basically looking to schmooze the financial community, to show they're less indulgent with Sandy Saemann."

Mr. Saemann didn't return phone calls.

Many agency executives also believe L.A. Gear will award a project to an agency in an effort to show Wall Street it's serious about making marketing changes but that the entire account will never materialize.

"They're sort of the Gallo of the south [southern California], aren't they?" said a principal of one agency that passed on the review, likening Mr. Saemann's control on L.A. Gear's advertising to E&J Gallo Winery Chairman Ernest Gallo's tight hold on Gallo advertising.

L.A. Gear executives "have made it clear [in the past] that they do not hold advertising agencies in high regard," said Phil Joanou, chairman-ceo of Dailey. For that reason, Mr. Joanou said he decided against pitching the account.

"I think they're basically looking to schmooze the financial community, to show they're less indulgent with Sandy Saemann," said Richard Groff, Ketchum's VP-strategic planning and development.

Like Gallo, L.A. Gear may keep handing out assignments as a way of getting its creative done, without ever awarding its account to one agency.

"When you get this assignment, you don't necessarily get the account," said one agency executive who last week approached L.A. Gear about joining the pitch.

"It's a total crapshoot" that any long-term relationship would come out of this, said an executive with another agency pursuing the account.

"We want to hire an outside agency," said Michael Albright, L.A. Gear's creative director. He said the company intends to assign its entire creative account, not just a project, to the agency chosen. The company once hired an outside agency, Ogilvy & Mather, Los Angeles, in 1986, but severed the relationship after a few weeks.

Though he acknowledged several agencies approached by L.A. Gear declined to pursue the business, Mr. Albright said he was "swamped" with calls from agencies seeking entree to the review.

"We're going to make a decision as quickly as possible," he said. Mr. Albright admitted that if L.A.

Safety first!

Safety's the ticket when business travelers are deciding which airline to fly, according to an exclusive Advertising Age/Gallup Organization poll of 1,050 people. Pleasure travelers say an airline's safety record and ticket price are equally important factors when they select a carrier.

AD AGE GALLUP SURVEY

"I'm surprised the responses weren't 100% safety record," says James O'Donnell, chairman of Seabrook Marketing and a former airline marketing executive.

How average consumers form their impressions of an air carrier's safety record is uncertain, however, because this information typically is not a part of airline advertising campaigns.

"Consumers are rarely in a position to make safety judgments. They usually use the term as a proxy for airlines' overall reliability.

"We know price is the predominant factor for leisure travelers, but often they won't admit it," says Mr. O'Donnell. "Business travelers are largely price insensitive, but they, too, are often ashamed to admit they don't care about price."

"The pleasure travel results make . . . sense—that safety and price are two issues for someone who doesn't fly a lot," says Jack Trout, president of Trout & Ries, a marketing strategist. "The safety issue is tricky, because where do consumers get statistics on that?"

The economic and financial turbulence that some airlines are currently experiencing may be bringing consumers' safety concerns to the surface, Mr. Trout says. Safety "might be an issue because some carriers are losing money and people might worry about maintenance," the executive says. □

Agency pay squeeze tarnishes one of the big glamor accounts

High pressure one thing, but profitability crucial

An Advertising Age roundup

Airline ad agencies are facing the final indignity.

The pressures in servicing an airline account are legendary: quick turnaround on creative; placing local media in multiple markets; intense price competition; killer hours; stiff client demands.

The payoff for agencies was receiving a commission on billings that were big enough to alleviate the trauma. Now, as airlines talk of pulling in their ad budgets and restructuring commission packages to cut costs, that incentive appears to be evaporating.

For Young & Rubicam, New York, not even $70 million in billings could convince it to stick with Trans World Airlines. The agency resigned the account last month rather than settle for what it considered an unfavorable payment structure.

Joseph DeDeo, president-ceo of Y&R, says the agency would have sustained unacceptable losses if it were to continue carrying the account. "We were already losing money on this account," he says.

According to an internal Y&R memo, TWA was "an especially difficult account with some very restrictive cost and timing requirements for creative work."

Agency executives say most major airlines compensate their agencies on a commission basis, typically paying 10% to 12% of billings—although they tend to gravitate toward the low end of that range.

"I don't think anybody's going to make a windfall on an airline account," says Dominick Rossi, president of N W Ayer, New York, which last spring lost Continental Airlines and shut its Houston office. "But those days are gone anyway. You can't operate at 7% [commission]."

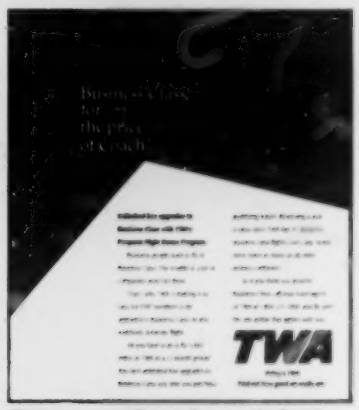
Mr. DeDeo doesn't necessarily blame the airlines for attempting to reduce costs. Deregulation, oil prices, mergers and acquisitions have saddled many airlines with enormous debt, he says.

"It's tough [for them] to make a buck," Mr. DeDeo says.

TWA is conducting a review for a small agency to replace Y&R. If that fails, the carrier may set up an in-house domestic agency and assign European advertising to a new outside agency.

Agency executives say that, given the financial conditions TWA wants to impose, the account is not very attractive.

"There may be an agency that would take it to get the new business. But their financial people and their creative people will hate them in the morning," says one agency executive.



TWA ads currently running are the last to come from Young & Rubicam, which resigned the account because it couldn't make money on a $70 million account.

Paul Gold, exec VP-account director on the American Airlines account at Bozell, Dallas, doesn't think many airlines will try in-house agencies.

"Airlines are basically looking to cut costs, and that kind of [in-house] operation does not cut costs," he says.

Alan Campbell, senior VP-group director of Ogilvy & Mather, New York, which handles Eastern Airlines, agrees economic problems will continue to reshape client-agency relationships.

"When [airlines] have problems, they make changes. They make changes in management, and [new] management makes changes in agencies," he says.

Although client-agency relationships appear stable at the Big 3 carriers—American Airlines, United Airlines and Delta Air Lines—management and ownership changes among many air carriers have created a round robin of agency hiring and firing (see box below.)

Despite the activity, airline marketing executives aren't anxious to switch agencies, even if the shop has experience in the category.

If there's trouble with the client's agency relationship, it's bet-

LOST IN TRANSIT

Airline account shifts may soon rival non-stop flights from O'Hare to LaGuardia in frequency. Here's a rundown of recent departures and arrivals:

- Young & Rubicam, New York, resigned the Trans World Airlines account. TWA plans to bring the account in-house or hire a small shop.
- Eastern Airlines replaced Lintas:New York with Ogilvy & Mather, New York.
- The Trump Shuttle account went to Great Scott Advertising, New York, after the carrier split from Scali, McCabe, Sloves, New York.
- Continental Airlines dropped N W Ayer for Wells, Rich, Greene, New York.
- In 1988, WRG left Pan American World Airways and was replaced by Della Femina, McNamee, New York, and Grey Advertising, New York. □

Agencies

ter to restructure people on the account than to make an agency change, says John Ruhaak, United's VP-advertising and promotion. "Changing agencies is hard work, and you lose ground for months while the new agency learns the business," he says.

Most new agencies are completely overwhelmed by the heavy volume of work and short turnaround time, says Michael Henderson, Eastern Airlines' staff VP-advertising and marketing communications.

The pace picks up even more when a competitor launches a fare initiative. "We have to order space and create well over 100 ads that need to run within four days," says Tom Morris, American Airlines' managing director-advertising and sales promotion. "The high intensity nature of the business puts pressure on the agency to perform."

Despite this, Mr. Henderson says agencies are drawn to the excitement of airline accounts, a statement agency executives confirm.

> "I don't think anybody's going to make a windfall on an airline."

FCB/Leber Katz Partners, New York, doesn't handle an airline account, but President Charles Taney says he'd like one.

"They're attractive on a couple of levels," he says. "The first is prestige; it's usually a great name to have at an agency. The second is the possibility of having spectacular creative. The third is . . . it's good volume and good revenue."

Mr. Campbell agrees, saying, "It's a major category, and the big ones spend big."

But he also says the costs to agencies are high, particularly in requiring more media people to service it. "When you're running spot or radio in 35 markets, that's where the cost factor comes in."

The expense can be offset by the visibility airline accounts bring an agency, Mr. Gold says. "On the other hand, I don't think there's an account more difficult in the entire advertising industry than an airline account." ☐

Newspapers show circulation gains

By Ira Teinowitz

Newspapers may be very worried about a recession's effect on advertising, but they also got some good news last week: generally strong circulation reports.

The Audit Bureau of Circulations' FAS-FAX report for the six months ending Sept. 30 once again had most major newspapers reporting gains, led by the Constitution in Atlanta, up 11.5% to a daily circulation of 316,793, and the Los Angeles Times, up 8% to 1,196,323. The Atlanta paper reported Sunday circulation rose 4.4% to 680,267, while the Times reported its Sunday circulation up 7.5% to 1,518,000.

Thirty-seven of the top 50 papers reported daily circulation increases, and 33 of the top 50 reported Sunday gains. Several of the top 50 couldn't be tabulated because of major publishing cycle changes or implementation of joint operating agreements since last year.

The report, however, contained some bad news for the already beleaguered New York Daily News. Six months after being forced to cede its claim as the U.S.' largest-circulation metro daily to the L.A. Times, the News lost its claim to being even New York's largest paper.

The New York Times took that title, boosted by a 3.8% gain in daily circulation to 1,108,447 and a 3.6% jump in Sunday circulation to 1,686,974. The Daily News saw its daily circulation slide 8.1% to 1,097,693 and Sunday circulation drop 1.5% to 1,401,403. The Times reported some of the gains came from a 13.8% boost in circulation of its national edition. The New York Post reversed its recent decline, with circulation up 0.5% to 510,219.

Thirty-seven of the top 50 papers reported daily circulation increases, and 33 of the top 50 reported Sunday gains. Several of the top 50 couldn't be tabulated because of major publishing cycle changes or implementation of joint operating agreements since last year.

Also reporting bad news was the Chicago Sun-Times, which saw its daily circulation slip 1.6% to 527,238 and its Sunday circulation drop 2.7% to 548,091.

Among others reporting losses: The Milwaukee Journal, down 3.7% to 265,461 daily and 0.1% to 505,074 on Sunday; the Sun-Sentinel, Fort Lauderdale, Fla., down 5.3% to 223,942 daily and 1.5% to 305,804 on Sunday; and the Philadelphia Daily News, down 3.0% to 225,063 daily.

The Sun-Times said its rate of decline is decreasing and noted that circulation decreases by the rival Chicago Tribune within the city had increased the Sun-Times' lead in the city on daily circulation and narrowed the Tribune's Sunday lead.

The Sun-Sentinel blamed price increases taken to avoid having to raise ad rates.

The latest figures include results from new JOAs in Detroit and Las Vegas, Nev., and the elimination of afternoon papers in Kansas City, Mo., and Raleigh, N.C.

The Detroit Sunday News & Free Press reported 1,239,417 circulation, down 18.5% from last year's 1,519,920 for two separate papers.

The circulation gains weren't entirely unexpected.

"Typically, the number of households is growing at a rate of 1% a year, so it's not a surprise that circulation is growing," said Al Golin, VP-director of research for the Newspaper Advertising Bureau. "It often is easier to gain in sales than in penetration."

Still, Mr. Golin said the gains may reflect the newpaper industry's recent intense focus on marketing.

"There is a new emphasis on marketing inside the newspaper industry that is starting to pay off," he said.

Several of the local papers also reported special local circumstances that led to gains.

The L.A. Times attributed as much as half its gain to the folding of the Los Angeles Herald Examiner last November. The Times, however, also noted that it introduced a faster-reading format a year ago and on March 12 introduced its fourth suburban regional version of the paper.

The paper also has been offering discounts to cable TV subscribers who get the Sunday edition. The Times' Sunday circulation rose 19% in Orange County, where the paper provides a localized TV guide for local cable systems and then offers cable subscribers initial discounts of up to 50% on Sunday subscriptions, said Jeffrey S. Klein, assistant to the publisher.

Officials at Atlanta's Constitution, however, said the only major change they had made was to be more aggressive in circulation marketing. They suggested that readers may have been drawn to the paper as a result of changes made by new Editor Ron Martin, formerly of USA Today.

"We have a newspaper edited by Ron Martin that people love to read," said Dennis Berry, president of Atlanta Newspapers. Mr. Berry also noted that some local news stories—including Atlanta's win in its bid to host the 1992 Olympics—helped sales. ☐

Ad industry suffers crushing blow

Volvo faces FTC inquiry over rigged cars in 'monster truck' ads

By Raymond Serafin and Gary Levin

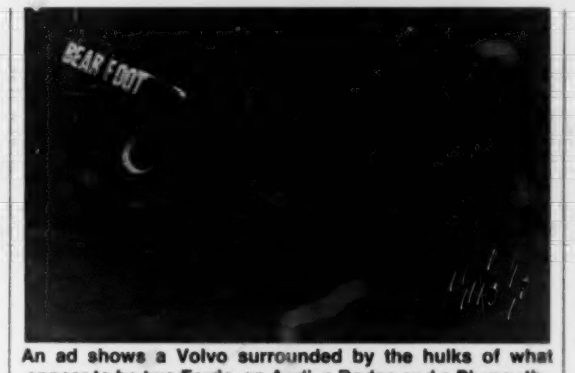
Advertising has sustained a swelling black eye in a rigged-demonstration scandal unlike anything to hit the industry since the 1960s and '70s.

Last week, Volvo Cars of North America admitted that cars were altered for a "monster-truck crushing" in agreeing to settle a lawsuit brought by the Texas attorney general. The case now threatens to mushroom as the Federal Trade Commission launches its own investigation.

Texas Attorney General Jim Mattox, in court papers, called the Volvo advertising "a hoax and a sham."

"We cannot afford a recurrence of this sort of thing," said Matthew Margo, CBS VP-program practices, whose office clears commercials for airing. "If this happens a few times, the entire system of trust is jeopardized."

"This is the iceberg, not the tip of the iceberg," Mr. Margo said. However, he added, the Volvo incident—even if isolated—remains a grave breach of ad industry standards that requires serious attention by the industry.



An ad shows a Volvo surrounded by the hulks of what appear to be two Fords, an Audi, a Dodge and a Plymouth.

Misuse of product demonstrations in the '60s and '70s led to a series of embarrassing, highly publicized FTC cases against such national advertisers as Campbell Soup Co. and Colgate-Palmolive Co. The Campbell case involved placing marbles in bowls of soup to make the food contents rise to the top.

Volvo last week ran corrective ads in 19 Texas newspapers, USA Today and The Wall Street Journal to explain the withdrawal of the ads and also reimbursed the attorney general's office $316,250 for investigative costs and legal fees.

With the rigged demonstration, Volvo has put at risk its longstanding reputation as "a car you can believe in," and Scali, McCabe, Sloves, New York, has put at risk a client relationship that dates from the agency's founding.

Following the announcement of the settlement, Volvo re-

'National' shake-up

Control taken from publisher amid cost cutting

By Scott Donaton and John McManus

NEW YORK—The National, the fledgling sports daily, was hit by a sweeping management reorganization last week, with Publisher Peter Price giving up day-to-day control of the newspaper and three other top executives departing.

The newspaper also announced it would suspend publication of its Sunday edition and an unspecified number of layoffs was imminent as the paper seeks to cut costs in the face of a soft advertising market.

Sources at The National who asked not to be identified said between 10 and 40 staffers from both the editorial and business staffs might be dismissed.

Mr. Price retained his title as president and publisher of The National but vacated his office, said newspaper spokesman Stephen Hammond. Mr. Price's responsibilities in the revamped organization were unclear, but Mr. Hammond said Mr. Price would be "working on the big picture."

The sweeping changes were believed ordered by Mexican media magnate Emilio Azcarraga Milmo, who owns a majority stake in the daily sports newspaper and is said to be unhappy with its progress.

Mr. Hammond confirmed that Jaime Davila, group VP at Univisa, which is owned by Mr. Azcarraga, was brought to New York from Los Angeles to oversee day-to-day operations of The National about three weeks ago.

Sources speculated Mr. Davila will continue to look for ways to trim costs.

"We've been spending with abandon for a year now," a National staffer said. "It had to stop somewhere."

Before The National's January launch, Mr. Azcarraga and his partners said they were prepared to spend as much as $100 million over the next five years before the newspaper turned a profit.

Messrs. Davila and Price were unavailable for comment last week.

In addition to Mr. Price's reassignment, Circulation Director Diane Morgenthaler, Assistant Publisher Timothy Lasker and Finance/Administration Director Daniel Correa were dismissed last week, Mr. Hammond confirmed. No replacements were named at press time.

Mr. Hammond also said The National will suspend publication of its Sunday edition with the Nov. 25 issue because circulation was lower than expected.

The National also plans to cease publishing its twilight edition, which contained late-breaking scores and was distributed primarily to suburban areas, and will instead start publishing an "All-American" edition, said

HDM doomed? Eurocom nears buyout, merger

By Jon Lafayette

The attempt by three of the world's biggest agencies on different continents to create a unique multicultural agency is about to end.

Paris-based Eurocom is expected to purchase all European shares of the three-way joint venture agency, HDM, and consolidate all its agency operations to form the largest network in Europe.

An agreement in principle with Eurocom's HDM partners, Young & Rubicam and Dentsu, is expected to be reached in the next two weeks, say sources familiar with the talks.

Under the agreement, Eurocom would become the sole owner of HDM's European agencies by buying out its partners' shares for between $80 million and $120 million.

Eurocom would also give up its share of HDM's U.S. and Asian operations, effectively ending the partnership that formed HDM, which currently bills about $2.6 billion worldwide.

Eurocom is expected to merge HDM's European offices with those of its Eurocom WCRS Della Femina Ball network to create what might be called Eurocom Advertising, sources say.

"They are going to have many client conflicts, and yes, they will lose some of them,

Nets set for Nielsen drop

NEW YORK—The Big 3 TV networks expect Nielsen Media Research to report an unexplained drop in TV usage levels again during the 1990-91 TV season despite efforts to improve the people-meter system. "Nielsen has still failed to explain the unprecedented variability that happened in the first quarter of 1990, and it is about to strike again," said Nicholas Schiavone, NBC's VP-media and market research. He's also chairman of the Committee on Nationwide Television Audience Measurement, a group of representatives from the networks and the National Association of Broadcasters. Privately, network

FNN draws suitors

Diamandis interested in troubled cable net

By John McManus

Publishing entrepreneur Peter Diamandis and several media companies may make bids for the financially beleaguered Financial News Network.

New management at Infotechnology, the owner of 47% of FNN, last week put the 24-hour cable TV business-news channel on the block. Cable industry sources said the asking price is $150 million to $200 million.

Media companies said to have expressed interest in FNN include Capital Cities/ABC, Dow Jones & Co., Hearst Corp., NBC, Paramount Communications, Tele-Communications Inc., Turner Broadcasting System, Time Warner, Viacom and Whittle Communications.

FNN is $50 million in debt and under investigation by the U.S. Securities & Exchange Commission for alleged bookkeeping irregularities that led to the dismissal of FNN's chief financial officer last month.

Still, TV industry analysts say FNN would be an attractive property, not only in its current format but for the asset value of about 35 million homes now under contract with cable operators to carry the channel through 1993.

"FNN is considered to be a good service and a very attractive property because of its extensive subscriber base," said a media analyst who asked not to be identified. "Their ability to sell depends on questions as to the extent of their financial problems, and to what degree the SEC investigation will raise concerns among prospective buyers."

Mr. Diamandis most recently was chairman of Diamandis Communications Inc., now Hachette Magazines.

When he left Hachette in September, Mr. Diamandis agreed to a no-compete clause barring him from magazine ventures until July. He said he has received more than 50 proposals for new magazines but is looking at other media, including FNN.

"Magazines are my first love, but I am looking at TV, radio and direct marketing," he said.

"There's been a significant expression of interest. . . . getting distribution to 35 million homes is very difficult these days."

Mr. Diamandis said if he were to buy the network, he would want its format to be entirely financial programming.

Hearst, expanding aggressively in its cable interests, last week announced it had acquired RJR Nabisco's 20% stake in ESPN for between $175 million and $200 million (AA, Sept. 10). A week earlier, it unveiled plans for a 24-hour regional cable news channel in Boston in a joint venture with Continental Cablevision.

"We've been looking at FNN for a long time and we continue to be interested in it," said Raymond Joslin, a Hearst corporate VP and president of the company's entertainment and syndication division.

FNN's principal competitor, Consumer News & Business Channel, has gained momentum in the past several months and expects to reach its goal of adding 10 million subscribers to its base of 16 million by yearend, said Thomas Rogers, president of NBC Cable, which runs CNBC.

"Given our momentum and the success of CNBC, it would be very unlikely that NBC would purchase FNN as a business news channel," Mr. Rogers said.

Last week, Infotech announced it had hired investment banking firm Wertheim Schroder & Co. to handle the sale of operations that include FNN and other Infotech businesses such as the 97%-owned United Press International wire service.

FNN and Infotech have said operating cash flows at the companies were insufficient to meet operating expenses or to cover maturing obligations coming due this year.

Infotech said in a prepared statement it hopes to find a buyer for FNN and its other business by yearend.

"What we're going through is a painful evolution in our development," said Michael Wheeler, FNN president. "There's been a significant expression of interest because the cable landscape is really in a supply and demand situation, and getting distribution to 35 million homes is very difficult these days." ☐

B&H account may move

By Judann Dagnoli and Jon Lafayette

A high-level marketing strategy summit of Philip Morris USA executives left Wells, Rich, Greene's future on the $60 million Benson & Hedges account in doubt.

Philip Morris executives at a regularly scheduled meeting in Florida last week denied a published report that the Benson & Hedges account moved to Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, from WRG, New York. Burnett earlier was assigned Benson & Hedges DeNic, testing in Phoenix, Ariz., since Oct. 1 (AA, Sept. 10).

But one source at the meeting, while denying the move of the overall account, didn't offer long-term assurance to WRG.

"Not everything is secure forever," he said. "We're assessing everything."

The meeting's purpose, this executive said, was to map overall strategy for all the company's brands.

"Advertising is not even at the top of the list [of the discussions]," he said. "It's only one part of a larger decision about how you're going to run your business."

But a source close to the company said Philip Morris seems to be cutting back on advertising. So, the company could make a case for consolidating its cigarette agencies, he said, and WRG would be the loser if that happens. WRG's only Philip Morris account is Benson & Hedges.

Under that scenario, Burnett, agency for Philip Morris' Marlboro, Merit, Virginia Slims, Cambridge and Alpine cigarettes, would come out the winner.

WRG Chairman Ken Olshan said only that "we're still working for Philip Morris."

September's ascendency of William Campbell, 46, to president-ceo of Philip Morris from senior VP-corporate planning seems to have initiated the tongue-wagging.

Mr. Campbell already has shifted domestic sales responsibilities from Vincent Buccellato, 44, to Michael Szymanczyk, 41, a Philip Morris newcomer formerly with Swift-Eckrich (AA, Oct. 29). Mr. Buccellato is now senior VP-marketing and sales for Philip Morris International.

Mr. Campbell also named Lawrence Wexler, 38, senior VP-planning and information systems, succeeding James Morgan, 48, now VP-marketing planning, Philip Morris Management Corp.

Although Mr. Campbell, who served as Philip Morris' top marketing executive from 1983 to 1989, is said to have close ties with WRG, even he wouldn't guarantee the security of the account at the agency.

"I'm a fairly rational, objective kind of guy and I do what's right for the business. That's the basis upon which any of those decisions [about agency changes] will be made," he said. "I'm not the chief marketing officer of this company anymore; I'm the chief executive officer."

Philip Morris is waiting for a new campaign from WRG, supposedly on the way since the agency barely managed to hold onto the account in October 1989.

Mr. Campbell said Philip Morris looks at Benson & Hedges as a regional brand with regional strengths. He also noted that both Benson & Hedges and Merit, under pressure from branded generic cigarettes, "have been doing a bit more promotion, and they've been doing it successfully."

Mr. Campbell also said Philip Morris' spending "is basically flat" this year.

He denied rumors that the company's volume gains are lower than in previous years, saying the company's volume and share "will be up a little bit more this year, actually, than last year. Certainly we'll be in line with expectations." ☐

Strictly business at key publishers

Low-end, in-home users told to look elsewhere

By Debora Toth

Despite all the sound and fury from major PC marketers, the home computer market signifies nothing to publishers of the leading computer magazines.

"Our clear focus is on the business market," says Sam Huey, group VP at Ziff-Davis Publishing Co., publisher of MacUser and MacWeek.

"The home market is an extension to the business market. Our readers could be buying computers for home, but for business use. We have no plans to add editorial space for low-end, in-home use," Mr. Huey says.

Others even dispute the existence of a home computer market.

"From our perspective, the home is not a market, it's a location," says Michael Kolowich, publisher of Ziff-Davis' PC/Computing. "The expenditure has to justify the need. The principal purpose [of buying a computer for the home] has to be business. Once in the home, other members may use it."

Adding editorial space for home users would be premature for these publishers, says Timothy McInerney, senior associate at consultancy McNamee Consulting Co. "Home users don't represent a significant part of the [computer]-buying audience."

Leading computer magazine executives seem willing only to provide limited editorial space for business readers who have computers at home—and continue to watch the market.

Macworld, a monthly published by Macworld Communications, is waiting to see how the lower-cost machines are accepted.

> "Home is not an issue. It's IBM's wishful view of the world."

"We're still evaluating the home market," says Dan Orum, VP-circulation and marketing.

If more people purchase these low-cost machines, he says, there may be more reader demand for home computer editorial. "If there's a gain in circulation, there'll be a gain in [home computer-related] advertisers."

PC Magazine, a Ziff-Davis every-other-weekly, in December plans a special editorial section in which it will review new home computers for the holidays.

"Surveys show that our readers extend their business day by using a computer at home," says Editor William Machrone.

"The home market has always needed horsepower. But prices are way down, and it's an idea whose time has come. If we see growth, we may add more [editorial] pages [for the home market]."

At present, however, leading computer magazines aren't chasing the home computer market and its advertisers.

"Home is not an issue [for these magazines]," Mr. McInerney insists. "It's IBM's wishful view of the world." □

Ikea mulls Euro shop

By Laurel Wentz

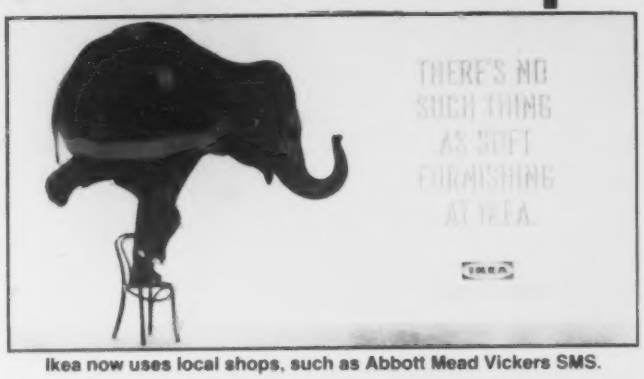
Ikea, the Swedish furniture marketer, wants to create a single European brand image and will name its first pan-European agency next month.

The budget will come from the $70 million Ikea now spends on local advertising in the 11 Western European countries where it has stores. The size of the effort won't be decided until after an agency is selected, said Ebbe Pele Jacobsen, retail manager for Ikea Germany and head of a European marketing council formed to select an agency.

The pan-European account "is going to be fairly limited at the beginning, but it will increase," Mr. Jacobsen said.

"It's corporate image advertising only," he said. "Everything else will be done on the local level. We've been working with eight different agencies in 11 countries and have probably eight different images."

Ikea is hearing presentations this month from McCann-Erickson Worldwide; Grey Advertising; Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide; Peyrat & Associes, Paris; Abbott Mead Vickers SMS, London; and Brindfors, Stockholm. The Swedish agency handles Ikea in the company's two biggest European markets, Germany and Sweden, plus Belgium. Abbott Mead Vickers and Peyrat are Ikea's agencies in the U.K. and France, respectively.



Ikea now uses local shops, such as Abbott Mead Vickers SMS.

Mr. Jacobsen said the uneven quality of Ikea's TV commercials and lack of a corporate image prompted the agency search.

"We were frustrated and distressed with our TV advertising," he said. "We had some of the best and some of the worst in Europe."

Retail advertising will continue through the local agencies.

In Germany, for example, Ikea last year spent $16.3 million on advertising, virtually all of it in print with only 3.2% for TV. Another estimated $7 million was spent on inserts and leaflets.

In the U.K., where Ikea has two stores and a $4 million ad budget, Abbott Mead Vickers has created both TV and print ads. TV spot shows a weeping woman who's just bought an expensive sofa and then discovers a similar, cheaper one in the Ikea catalog.

In France, where retail TV commercials are banned, Peyrat has created an outdoor campaign. On the left board, labeled "Before," a man is assembling a double bed. On the right board, labeled "After," he's putting together a baby's crib. □

France races along with EC

Aiming at parallel '92 ad laws

By Bruce Crumley

PARIS—France is taking the lead in Europe in introducing national legislation parallel to proposed European Community laws regulating advertising.

Although plans to restrict alcohol advertising in France suffered a major setback last month, they could re-emerge. And a proposed law allowing comparative ads will be debated later this fall.

"France has a tradition of greater [government] control and direct involvement in matters [than] in other markets," said Andre Bernard, Brussels-based chairman of Lintas' Initiative Media International. "That may explain why France is in the forefront of the battle for regulation."

The EC is rushing to enact legislation to create a single European market by Dec. 31, 1992, and restrictions on alcohol advertising have been discussed at that level and a comparative advertising directive is being drafted.

French legislation under debate in the same areas enables the French "to show initiative and set a precedent and the possibility, for the future, to apply even more restrictive practices than are likely to come out of a directive," Mr. Bernard said.

A proposal passed by the National Assembly in June to ban all tobacco and virtually all alcohol advertising was defeated in the Senate Oct. 17. Under heavy pressure from wine producers, senators widened greatly the exemptions for alcohol advertising but passed the section banning tobacco advertising. The new bill will be returned to the National Assembly for debate.

"I think they'll have to pass something on this since they've made such a big deal out of it," said Rona Pashkin-Boyer, general manager at McCann-Erickson, "but exactly what will be exempted in the alcohol clause is anybody's guess. They are not about to penalize the French agricultural industry."

"This [legislation] is a bad answer to a real problem," said Alain Grange-Cabane, French Advertisers Association VP. "They are making the advertisers the scapegoats and avoiding the real causes of this kind of abuse."

The government estimates smoking and alcoholism account for 65,000 and 45,000 deaths per year, respectively. The alcohol marketers' lobbying group Entreprise & Prevention estimates that banning alcohol ads would result in an annual revenue loss of $79.2 million to the press alone.

Meanwhile, French Secretary of State for Consumer Affairs Veronique Neiertz won approval from the National Consumer's Council to draft a law to introduce comparative advertising.

Consumer studies indicate a majority of consumers favor regulated comparative advertising as a way to get more product information.

R. Paskhin-Boyer

"Almost all media and advertisers are against" comparative advertising, Mr. Grange-Cabane said, "because it never gives the full picture and leads the consumer to false conclusions."

Comparative advertising is banned in virtually all European countries. When Pepsi-Cola Co., for example, tried to bring the "Pepsi Challenge" taste test to Europe several years ago, Pepsi ended up in court in several markets.

"It's a morality question, because the information given in a 30-second commercial cannot be accurate. . . . Its use in the U.S. and elsewhere demonstrates this clearly," McCann's Mrs. Pashkin-Boyer said. "Also, French advertising deals with emotions, feelings and images, not with facts. If you have to cram ads full of information, you are going to lose this other aspect."

Despite the French actions, industry executives don't believe the goal is to head off pan-European legislation in Brussels.

"I think the government saw that the abuse of alcohol and tobacco is more frequent in France . . . and it wanted to take stronger action" than the EC, Mr. Grange-Cabane said. □

Coke tops in Americas

By Julie Skur Hill

Coca-Cola ads are the choice of a new generation of North and South Americans.

The ads ranked high with respondents to a one-time Gallup Organization survey last summer that asked which advertising seen in the past month first comes to mind.

Coca-Cola Co. ads were among the top six ads mentioned in seven of eight Western Hemisphere nations and were cited the most often in four countries.

Face-to-face surveys were conducted by Gallup and its affiliates in the U.S., Canada, Uruguay, Chile, Argentina, Brazil, Mexico and Panama. Dates of interviews and size of sample vary by country.

In all, 7,498 people were surveyed, with the margin of error varying from 2% to 7% by country.

Ads of archrival Pepsi-Cola Co. were named among the top six in four countries, and McDonald's Corp. appeared in the top six of two countries.

But none of those three made the top six in Brazil. Panasonic Co. and Sharp Corp. were the only multinational marketers to appear among the list of six in Latin America's largest market.

In the same survey, respondents were asked whether now is a good time to make major household purchases, and answers varied greatly across the two continents.

Canadians had the most optimism, with 43% saying now is a good time. However, nearly as many—40%—said major purchases should be postponed at this time.

In the U.S., Gallup asked the same question in surveys before and after the invasion of Kuwait. In July, 36% of U.S. consumers surveyed expressed optimism. By September, that number had dropped to only 30%.

U.S. pessimism grew in like measure. In September, 52% said major purchases should be postponed, up from 43% in July.

Opinions of Panamanians contrast greatly with their northern neighbors. Merely 8% of Panamanians said this is a good time to make major purchases; 59% said the opposite.

Attitudes in Uruguay and Brazil were the gloomiest, with 68% and 62%, respectively, saying now is not a good time to make major purchases.

Chileans were the most unsure about the current economic climate, with 54% volunteering the answer that this is neither the right time nor the wrong time to make a major purchase. □

Marketers study state guidelines

By Jennifer Lawrence and Laurie Freeman

National advertisers are reacting favorably to environmental marketing guidelines recommended by a multistate task force—except for a limit on disposability claims.

Specifically, the 10-state task force proposed that environmental claims relating to disposability shouldn't be used unless the advertised disposal option is available to consumers in the area in which the product is sold.

For now, this would severely limit the use of claims like "photodegradable," "biodegradable," "compostable" and "recyclable."

The task force, led by Minnesota Attorney General Hubert Humphrey III, released the preliminary recommendations late last week.

The disposability recommendation appears to limit advertising and promotion of the way a product can be disposed of to systems already in place in communities, said Robert M. Viney, associate advertising manager at Procter & Gamble Co. He said the guideline doesn't take into account recycling or composting systems that a community might develop in the future.

"Even if a package can't be recycled or composted today, consumers should have that information in a non-promotional way, like on a package, indicating that steps are being taken to make it possible to remove that package from a landfill in the future," Mr. Viney said.

Last month, P&G said it planned to spend at least $20 million on composting projects.

Melinda Sweet, director of environmental affairs at Lever Bros., said requiring that claims reflect current disposal options would be "incredibly cumbersome for manufacturers" and "confusing to consumers."

Lever said packaging is the appropriate place to put recycling messages such as "recyclable where facilities exist."

Further, marketers' nationwide distribution systems would make it hard to accommodate such a recommendation, since specific labeling would be designated by specific municipality, she said.

"We feel very strongly that this is an area we need to hammer out with regulators and environmentalists," Ms. Sweet said.

Still, P&G's Mr. Viney and Ms. Sweet said the attorneys general are on the right track in calling for a set of national environmental ad guidelines.

Until such national standards are developed by the Federal Trade Commission or Environmental Protection Agency, the states suggest marketers follow these voluntary recommendations:

- Environmental claims should be as specific as possible, not general, vague, incomplete or overly broad—such as "environmentally friendly" and "safe for the environment."
- Disposability claims shouldn't be made unless that disposal option is available in the area in which the product is sold.
- Green claims should be substantive—avoid trivial and irrelevant claims that give a false impression of a product's overall environmental soundness.
- Environmental claims should be supported by competent and reliable scientific evidence.

The task force will hear testimony on the recommendations on Dec. 10 and 11 in San Diego. Companies interested in testifying should contact by Nov. 26 Supervising Deputy Attorney General Albert Shelden, California Attorney General's Office, 110 W. A St., Suite 700, San Diego 92101. □

Consumers turning green: JWT survey

By Gary Levin

Marketers have only begun to tap the vast potential of green marketing.

That's the opinion of J. Walter Thompson Co.'s Greenwatch survey, which says companies can't simply slap an environmental claim onto a product; they must see it through a product's entire life cycle and communicate the philosophy to consumers.

"What is environmentally the right thing to do is becoming increasingly more the economically right thing to do," said Peter Kim, senior VP-executive research director at JWT USA, New York.

But he said marketers must move cautiously.

"Any company that prematurely jumps on the environmental wagon without being cognizant of environmental benefits or hazards of their product is asking for negative reaction from the public," Mr. Kim said. "One of the greatest disservices we can do is market [environmental claims] irresponsibly . . . because it will come back to haunt you even if there's a short-term gain."

JWT said that so far, the environmental emphasis by many marketers has been on disposability of both packages and products, such as McDonald's Corp.'s recent announcement that it will replace plastic foam packaging.

But the agency added that attention is now shifting toward the manufacturing process. For example, companies could help reduce harmful dioxins by not bleaching paper products such as toilet paper, tampons and coffee filters.

JWT's June telephone survey of 1,000 adults revealed major shifts toward environmentalism by consumers.

This year, an average of 82% of those surveyed said they'd pay 5% or more extra for environmentally friendly products, compared with just 49% in 1989. Of those surveyed, 84% would pay extra specifically for baby food, while only about 70% would pay extra for bottled water and disposable diapers.

Most marketers haven't fully capitalized on their newfound environmentalism, and negative perceptions far outweigh positives, the survey found.

Only 40% of those surveyed remembered advertising for any company that specifically mentioned environmental efforts; 34% remembered an ad that discussed a product's environmental safety; and just 14% said they could recall environmental advertising for a specific company.

On the other hand, 56% said they knew of companies whose actions had harmed the environment; 64% said they're less likely to buy from a company with a poor environmental record; and 27% said they've already boycotted a product because of such a record.

Attempting to ride the crest of the green movement, marketers are bringing out a huge number of what could be considered new green products.

JWT estimated that 520 products fitting that desciption will be introduced in 1990—roughly 9% of all new products—compared with 262 in 1989 (4.5% of new products) and just 24 in 1985 (0.5.% of new products). The vast majority are positioned as "body friendly," appealing to personal welfare, with fewer sold as animal-cruelty-free or as anti- water pollution, air pollution or solid waste.

JWT also identified four groups of U.S. consumers, ranging from the die-hard "greener-than-greens," at 23% of the population, to the unconcerned "un-greens," which amount to 3%.

In between are the somewhat-concerned "greens" (59%), who are willing to make some sacrifices for the environment, and the "light greens" (15%), who are concerned but unwilling to sacrifice.

Not surprisingly, the "greener-than-greens" tend to be better-educated older females with high incomes and liberal orientation, who say they're willing to pay more for environmentally friendly products.

The "un-greens," in contrast, tend to be younger, apolitical, less well-educated males, who earn less money, won't buy recycled products and say they "live for today."

Geographically, the Pacific Northwest is the most "progreen" region of the country, while the Midwestern Rust Belt was cited as the least concerned and least knowledgeable about the environment.

The study made these recommendations for companies that want to take advantage of the green movement:

- Get top management involved by developing an "in-house environmental knowledge base" to set green standards for your company. Make public your environmental intentions.
- Create an internal group of green advisers to evaluate the impact of your products from manufacturing to packaging to disposal.
- Develop a dialogue with environmental groups, seeking input, providing information and positioning your company as environmentally responsible.
- Get to know the "greener-than-greens." Identify new green product opportunities and advertise their benefits.

The ongoing survey, planned every three to four months on various green topics, was conducted for JWT by Knowledge Systems Research. Margin of error is less than 3%. □

Minute Maid's Olympian effort nets first place in the tie-in race

(Rating: ★★★)

By Bob Garfield

Garfield

Only 604 shopping days till Barcelona. Why wait? Order now.

Yes, marketers, it's time to start thinking how you can invest untold sums on 1992 Summer Olympics tie-ins, so that, when the Games begin, you and 3,286 other companies can simultaneously boast about your singular support of our athletes and have your inspiring messages lost in a patriotic din.

Just be advised, however: Somebody is way ahead of you.

Coca-Cola Foods' Minute Maid line of juices, having committed its entire, two-year, $130 million marketing budget to a Summer Games tie-in, is not about to wait till the last minute to begin getting value. By the last minute, of course, I mean 1991.

Minute Maid is on the air right now with the first Official 60-Second Spot of the 1992 Olympics. Created by Lowe & Partners, New York, it opens at 5:14 a.m. in a shabby inner-city apartment, where Mom is waiting in the kitchen as her teen-age son jumps from his bunk bed to the floor.

The early bird gets the worm, the early riser gets to diving practice and the early Olympics tie-in advertiser—Minute Maid products—gets the marketing advantage.

"It's early, baby. Keep it down," Mom says, finger to her lips. "Don't wake your brother."

The boy grabs his gear and heads out. Then, over shrill street sounds, in an overwrought, metronomic delivery, the first of several voice-over narrators says, "To be, or not to be: that is the question." Ah, yes, Hamlet's soliloquy, the most famous passage in English literature. Apparently this young man has risen bright and early . . . to commit suicide?

No, after a percussive rap version of the next stanza ("Whether 'tis nobler," etc.), the boy treks across the gritty urban-industrial-fringes landscape to an indoor swimming pool, where he hits the 3-meter board and executes a crisp forward 2½ with a full twist. Splash.

Announcer: "Without help, our Olympic hopefuls may never get the chance to compete. Minute Maid would like to make sure they do, so, starting now, and for the next two years, we'll make a contribution to the U.S. Olympic Hopefuls Fund every time you buy a Minute Maid product. Before life takes these kids somewhere else, won't you help us take them to the Olympics?"

America's probable response: You bet!

In previous Olympiads, many advertisers have tied-in product purchase with contributions, enabling consumers to jingle their jingoism at the cash register. But, because the ads all hit at once, and all offered the same level of psychological benefit, their appeal was muted, to say the least. Miller, Budweiser and Coors all found ways to tie into the Olympics somehow, so who profited? (Answer: ABC, NBC and CBS.)

Minute Maid's is a pre-emptive strike against do-gooder dilution. By being first, it will establish its Olympic credentials before somebody else weighs in. By adding the Save-This-Youngster twist, it notches up the consumer's patrio-socio-psychological stake.

Apart from the pretentious perversion of Shakespeare and the standard patriotic heart-tugs, this is an ingenious invocation of Police Athletic League marketing: "If you don't save this lad, he's destined for a squalid life of street crime, drugs and inconsiderately waking younger siblings."

Sure, P.A.L. has used it, the Boy Scouts have used it, the Boys Clubs and Big Brothers of America have used it. But seldom before has a for-profit business used it—and certainly never one so rich in vitamin C.

Copywriter Barbara Siegel's use of "To be or not to be," winds up being apt—because the viewer's implicit choice is saving a life or condemning one. And director David Cornell's claustrophobic cinema verite of real-life diving hopeful Pat Evans is just the touch for driving the choice home.

So, yes, Minute Maid seems to have quite the running start. But as long as we're quoting Shakespeare, let's consider the possible cause-marketing backlash of so visibly, so impatiently selling orange juice and lemonade on the backs of underprivileged athletes—a backlash that being ahead of the pack can only aggravate.

As the Bard noted, "The weakest kind of fruit drops earliest to the ground." □

NBC, McDonald's to link up again

By Wayne Walley

NEW YORK—The much-maligned "McMillions on NBC" fall promotion is likely to make a comeback next year.

NBC and McDonald's Corp. are expected to meet after Thanksgiving to consider several marketing partnerships, including a reprise of the $35 million sweepstakes, said John Miller, the network's exec VP-marketing.

"We will be doing more with McDonald's in the future, and talk is favorable about doing 'McMillions' again in the fall," Mr. Miller said. "We were all pleased with the partnership."

Participants had to pick up a new game card at McDonald's each day of the 28-day promotion, then watch a specific NBC show to find out that night's $1 million winning number.

If no one claimed the prize by 4 p.m. (ET) the next day, the money was added to the jackpot.

NBC said the contest generated 25 million extra viewers, with specific shows averaging a 6% rating increase when the winning number was revealed.

The network also said its research showed the play rate for "McMillions" was 15 times greater than for CBS' "Get Ready Giveaway" promotion with K mart Corp.

"The question is how to make it more effective. Maybe there are ways to improve the game," Mr. Miller said. "McDonald's said once the faux pas happened [a $10 million winner was disqualified because her daughter worked for McDonald's], the game took off because of the multimedia exposure. If there's a way to jump-start it, this is a good thing to continue."

Despite media industry criticism that NBC's initial ratings results from the contest were disappointing, Mr. Miller said these kinds of big-ticket co-promotions with major advertisers are fast becoming a necessity to help networks improve awareness.

"You can't buy share of voice anymore," he said. "You have to do tie-ins with media to get the extra mileage and hope for a breakthrough. We are dealing with a situation in 1990 where the combined cable entities, pay and basic channels, exceeded the paid media spending by the four networks to entice viewers. I thought [NBC's] share of voice in paid media would be much greater than 20%, but it is only 11%."

"The question is how to make it more effective. . . . If there's a way to jump-start it, this is a good thing to continue."

NBC, in an effort to attract both viewers and advertisers, is also creating a special 20-city "NBC Comedy Tour" to hype its late-night schedule.

The network is pitching advertisers a $2 million to $5 million package including sole sponsorship of the tour and time in "The Tonight Show Starring Johnny Carson" and "Late Night With David Letterman."

Details have yet to be settled, but Mr. Miller said the network hopes to have a key NBC personality as the tour's host. The plan would be for other comedians who've appeared on NBC's late-night programs to participate in the tour as well. □

P&G tops in network TV

By Wayne Walley

NEW YORK—Procter & Gamble Co. was the top network and spot TV advertiser for the first half of 1990, while Philip Morris remained the top syndicated TV spender, Arbitron Co.'s Broadcast Advertisers Reports said.

P&G increased network TV to $273.7 million, up 60% from a year earlier, leapfrogging over General Motors Corp. ($268.8 million, up 9%) and Philip Morris ($229.2 million, up 17%). Other leading network advertisers included Kellogg Co. ($163.5 million, up 2%) and Sears, Roebuck & Co. ($140.8 million, up 67%).

Total ad spending on the Big 3 networks rose 11% to $5.2 billion, BAR reported.

Among spot TV advertisers, P&G was first ($131.8 million, up 38%), followed by Philip Morris ($126.5 million, up 45%), General Mills ($76.1 million, up 39%), GM ($55.8 million, up 55%) and PepsiCo ($53.3 million, up 1%).

Spot TV ad spending rose 5% to $2.7 billion.

Philip Morris increased syndicated TV spending by 33% to $78 million, followed by P&G ($47.4 million, up 53%), Unilever ($25.6 million, up 64%), Kellogg ($23 million, down 3%) and Warner-Lambert Co. ($19.8 million, up 83%).

National syndicated TV ad spending was $726.4 million, up 27%. □

Volvo parent seizes control of inquiry

Law firms join investigation of 'monster truck' ads

By Raymond Serafin and Jennifer Lawrence

Swedish parent company AB Volvo has stepped in to take over the internal investigation of the U.S. unit's fraudulent "monster truck" advertising, showing Volvo's concern for the issue's long-term effects.

The parent and the audit committee of Volvo Cars of North America have retained McCarter & English, Newark, N.J., that state's largest law firm, to handle the investigation, confirmed George McCarter, a partner.

Late last week, McCarter & English attorneys were in Austin, Texas, trying to uncover who authorized modifications made to cars used in the Volvo commercial.

Despite last week's resignation by agency Scali, McCabe, Sloves, New York, of the $40 million account, questions remain over who authorized, and who knew of, the product rigging that took place at a production shoot June 12 in Austin.

The parent company also brought in a company director who isn't part of U.S. management to help conduct the investigation, raising questions about AB Volvo's confidence in its U.S. subsidiary.

Bob Austin, manager-public relations for Volvo Cars of North America, said the law firm is one the company doesn't normally use and that Volvo will eventually make public the investigation's major findings.

Eastern's last gasp?

New crisis puts Shugrue back in ad spotlight

By Jennifer Lawrence and Judann Dagnoli

Eastern Airlines will put Martin Shugrue back into the advertising limelight in what could be a final attempt to save the troubled carrier.

Eastern last week overcame a creditors' committee effort to force the carrier to liquidate on the strength of Mr. Shugrue's impassioned argument before a bankruptcy judge that his marketing plan will save the airline.

Although Eastern's strategy had called for Mr. Shugrue to relinquish his role as corporate pitchman, the airline's latest crisis puts him in front of the cameras again.

All future corporate ads will use Mr. Shugrue, the trustee appointed by the court in April to run Eastern, a company insider said.

In response to an abundance of death-knell news stories last week, Mr. Shugrue appears in a new 30-second TV spot that says the carrier will be around "well into 1991."

General Mills will spend $50 million on its first national cereal introductions in two years: Triples and Basic 4.

New cereals power Big G's market push

By Julie Liesse

General Mills will get the chance to prove it's got the momentum in the $6.9 billion cereal market with the January introduction of Basic 4 and Triples cereals.

General Mills' one-two punch, supported by an estimated $50 million in introductory spending, comes at a time when it seems to be outperforming leader Kellogg Co. in both share and marketing gains.

But few new cereal brands in the past two years have been successful, and only General Mills' own Apple Cinnamon Cheerios, launched in late 1988, is considered a blockbuster newcomer, with about a 1.6% share.

The food industry will be watching the debuts of Basic 4 and Triples even more closely because they're General Mills' first totally new brands since the ill-fated Benefit psyllium cereal, which was pulled out of regional distribution last December after less than a year.

"General Mills has been particularly successful in line-extending existing products to gain momentum and share. These new products will be a good test for the company, to see if they can continue that progress with a brand-new product," said Timothy Ramey, analyst with County NatWest Securities USA.

Basic 4 will be positioned as an adult cereal that, when served with milk, provides four basic food groups. In addition to corn and multigrain flakes, Basic 4 contains four fruits (apples, cranberries, prunes and raisins) and two nuts (almonds and yogurt-covered walnuts).

"General Mills invented the all-family presweetened cereal, with Honey Nut Cheerios, and this seems in line with that strategy—great taste combined with nutrition—on a more elaborate basis," said a senior executive at a competing agency.

"Everyone has been so focused on how General Mills has led the category through its

Volvo loss worsens tailspin at Scali

By Gary Levin

NEW YORK—The Volvo commercial-rigging incident has cast a long shadow over an already troubled agency.

Executives at Scali, McCabe, Sloves, which last week resigned the $40 million Volvo Cars of North America account under pressure after a public outcry, say the loss of its largest and oldest account merely caps what's already been a "horrible" year.

Just two days after the Volvo loss, amid more inquiries into modifications of cars used in a "monster truck" advertising campaign, Scali learned the creative portion of its largest single Canadian prize—Labatt Brewing Co.'s $15 million to $20 million Labatt's Blue beer account—would move to J. Walter Thompson Co., Toronto.

The account had been in review for the second time in two years. HYP&N, Toronto, a media buying company 50%-owned by Labatt, earlier pulled media buying from Scali's Toronto office, which continues to handle French-language Blue advertising and several smaller brands.

Post-Volvo, the agency's estimated billings have dropped 37% to $200 million from $318 million at the end of 1989. Volvo was Scali's first account when the agency opened in 1967.

Scali executives last week were concerned about getting their side of the Volvo story out but seemed reluctant to do so because of possible lawsuits among Scali, Volvo and the production house involved, Perretti Productions, New York, and Federal Trade Commission action.

Agency Chairman-CEO Marvin Sloves said he would refrain from "finger pointing" pending a separate investigation by Scali's law firm, Paul Weiss Rifkind Wharton & Garrison.

"One thing I'd like to see is getting our reputation scrubbed clean and putting ourselves in line for another car account," said Vice Chairman Bob Levenson. "There's been a shadow over our credibility."

There's also been a shadow over its business. Scali's flagship office has lost more than $115 million in

McD's takes low-fat lead

By Scott Hume

McDonald's Corp. last week upped the ante in fast-food's competition to remove the most fat and calories from its menus.

Rivals aren't folding their hands, however, and are expected to bring more lower-fat foods onto their menus. One of the first could be PepsiCo's Kentucky Fried Chicken Corp. Restaurant industry sources say KFC hopes to take national in January the Light 'n Crispy chicken that's 45% lower in fat than Extra Crispy chicken.

McDonald's disclosed last week that it's testing a 91% fat-free hamburger patty in 45 Harrisburg, Pa., area outlets. The quarter-pound burger is served on a sesame seed bun with ketchup, mustard, pickle, onion, lettuce and tomato under the name McDonald's Lean Deluxe.

The new sandwich contains 10 grams of fat, compared with 20.7 grams in its Quarter Pounder, 29.2 in its Quarter Pounder With Cheese, 32.4 in the Big Mac and 36.8 in the McD.L.T.

McDonald's Lean Deluxe also undercuts rival Wendy's International's claim to the lowest-fat fast-food burger with its 15-gram quarter-pound Single.

Hardee's Food Systems in May began testing an 18-gram hamburger it calls the Lean 1, a sandwich it hopes to introduce systemwide by yearend.

McDonald's takes the lead in the race to reduce fat in fast-food with the 91% fat-free Lean Deluxe sandwich.

The low-fat ground beef in McDonald's Lean Deluxe was developed through research into the mixture of burger ingredients at Auburn University. The three-year project was funded by the Beef Industry Council of the Meat Board.

McDonald's, which provided the project some input on fast-food cooking methods, is the first chain to test the product, but other chains are expected to be given access to it in the future if it tests well.

McDonald's Lean Deluxe is testing at $1.79 and $1.84, about the same as its regular Quarter Pounder. There will be media advertising for the product, which went into stores Nov. 5, but only point-of-purchase ads have been used so far, a McDonald's spokeswoman said. National agency Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, has the assignment.

In July, McDonald's, Burger King Corp. and Wendy's all announced they were switching to 100% vegetable oil for all frying. Hardee's made the switch earlier this year.

Kentucky Fried Chicken is testing grilled chicken in three markets and Light 'n Crispy chicken in five. A company spokesman wouldn't comment on reports it intends to roll out Light 'n Crispy in the first quarter of '91.

Burger King and Wendy's also have rolled out grilled chicken sandwiches that contain less fat than fried chicken; McDonald's has begun testing a similar product.

Nutrition crusader Phil Sokolof said he believed his ad campaign last spring (AA, April 9, et seq.) "helped the general public become aware that McDonald's and the others are fat factories.

"Since then, McDonald's has made important changes like switching to vegetable oil," he said. "I'm elated this [lower-fat hamburger] has come about." □

Nestle eyes brand moves

By Judann Dagnoli

The creation of Nestle USA will lead to a reorganization of the Swiss giant's U.S. businesses along distribution lines and could cause some ad agency brand shifts.

Nestle USA effectively merges Carnation Co. with Nestle Enterprises to form a company with $7 billion in annual sales. Carnation and Nestle Enterprises, which includes Nestle Foods Corp. and Stouffer Foods Corp., had previously reported to parent Nestle SA separately.

Nestle hasn't said where it will base the new unit, but agency sources believe it will be in the new Carnation office in Glendale, Calif.

T. Crull

The formation of Nestle USA, effective Jan. 1, is part of a plan begun more than a year ago, when some products in similar categories were combined. Carnation's and Nestle Foods' frozen novelty lines went into Nestle Ice Cream Co. and Hills Bros. and Nescafe coffees merged into Nestle/Hills Coffee Co.

But the newly formed Nestle USA also offers additional synergies to further realign brands, agency sources say. One possibility, a source said, is merging Contadina Fresh pasta and sauces, now under Carnation Co., with FreshNes, a refrigerated line managed out of Stouffer.

Contadina Fresh is with McCann-Erickson Worldwide, Los Angeles; FreshNes is handled Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor, New York. Spending on Contadina Fresh was $7 million last

THE TOP 200 BRANDS

AT&T pushes past McDonald's

By R. Craig Endicott

Like a multitude of voices pulsating through optical fibers, ad spending during the first half of 1990 raced from AT&T through the nation's media channels at volumes exceeding all other brands.

In supplanting McDonald's Corp. as the nation's top brand, AT&T Co. plunked down $253 million in advertising during the period, $70.1 million on long distance service (up 73.5%) and $25 million on the Universal Card launched at the start of the second quarter, according to Advertising Age's report on the "Top 200 Brands."

AT&T ad expenditures jumped 52.8% from the prior-year period, and continued at the heady pace set in this year's first quarter. As the leading brand for the first quarter, its ad spending was $103.8 million, up 25.8% from first-quarter 1989.

The Top 200 brands are derived each quarter from nine-media composites provided by LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service. A "brand" is every product or service marketed under the same name regardless of industry class. This report compares the first six-month periods of 1990 and 1989.

As a group, the Top 200—ranging in spending levels from AT&T to Whirlpool appliances' No. 200 ranking at $14.4 million—captured 38.3% of all national media spending. This was up from 35.4% for the year-ago six-month period. The group also claimed 62% of all spending on network TV in the period, up from 57% in 1989, and comprised 31% of all spot TV expenditures, up from 29.6%.

Brands showing the biggest ad growth from 1989 to 1990 include Chrysler cars & trucks (as opposed to the parent's Plymouth and Eagle nameplates), which moved from No. 27 a year ago to No. 11 in first-half 1990 as the LeBaron and New Yorker in particular helped pushed brand spending to $85.5 million, up 51%.

Miller Beer, ranked No. 12, rose from No. 26 a year ago as spending leaped 40.1%, to $82.8 million. It outspent rival Budweiser beer, which slipped from No. 11 a year ago to No. 16 on media advertising of $79.3 million, down 6.7%.

While Budweiser's national media spending total is down, its overall advertising is up, notes parent Anheuser-Busch Cos. The brewer is diverting national media funds into local media not tracked by LNA/Arbitron.

Touchstone films and video, a Walt Disney Co. unit, rode heavy advertising for its 1990 blockbuster hits "Pretty Woman" and "Dick Tracy" to No. 26 among the Top 200 brands from No. 62 a year ago, when "Dead Poets Society" was its hit attraction.

Ultra Slim-Fast, the weight-reducing brand, leaped from No. 194 a year ago to No. 39 as Thompson Medical Co. fattened its ad spending to $46.9 million, up from only $6.4 million a year ago. Likewise, Nutri/System Weight Loss Centers advanced from No. 164 to No. 97 on an increase of 86.1% in advertising to $25.4 million.

Lexus, Toyota Motor Corp.'s upscale nameplate that hit the market in the summer of 1989, recorded $39.9 million in advertising to rank No. 52. Its competitor, Nissan Motor Co.'s Infiniti, spent $16.4 million in the first half 1990, compared to little advertising in 1989, to rank No. 172.

The nation's largest advertiser in 1989, Philip Morris Cos., is well on its way to a repeat performance in 1990. Eleven of the top 200 brands were from its stable, paced by No. 7 Kraft, which represented 27% of the $458.8 million PM spent on the 11 brands that made the ranking, a total that grew 13.6%.

Procter & Gamble, the nation's second-biggest advertiser, contributed 10 brands to the ranking; they amassed $229.2 million in advertising led by No. 50 Folgers coffees at $40.3 million.

PM may have had five brands above that position but P&G's brands demonstrated much stronger ad growth—up a collective 35.2%.

Bigness doesn't necessarily mean growth. General Motors' seven nameplates on the chart dropped 4.7% in total media advertising to $423.4 million.

Intense competition from the Japanese and sluggish car sales forced GM and other car marketers to divert marketing dollars to cash rebates, which often averaged more than $1,000 per car.

Advertising from the 200's voluminous automotive category, representing just over a fifth of its composite, grew by 6.4% compared with a 3% ad growth for the industry as a whole.

Spending for the Top 200 grew by 13.1% over the first half of 1989, while national media advertising for all other brands (LNA/Arbitron monitors 39,000 brands) dropped slightly during the period, an indication advertisers are thinking recession.

Even the Top 200, with their double-digit growth, can't mask a certain uneasiness about the economy:

- Two-quarter composites disguise a slippage in the second quarter for the Top 200. After an advance of 15.6% in the first quarter over the prior year, second-quarter ad volume dipped to a 10.9% gain from the prior year.
- Among media increments, consumer magazines dropped from an 0.6% decline in the first quarter to an 8.7% decline in the second, compared with prior-year results. Quarterly spending movement on network TV dipped from a 26% gain by the Top 200 in the first quarter to a more realistic 13% gain in the second.

On the upside, newspapers and network radio showed positive swings in quarterly movement, the former abetted by growth in automotive, airline, financial services and telephone services categories. Radio growth was aided largely by an infusion of advertising from telephone services.

- Among the 39,000 brands tracked by LNA/Arbitron that fell into the business and consumer services category (banks, S&Ls, credit cards), spending dropped 0.7% in the second quarter compared to the same period in 1989, the automotive/automotive accessories and equipment category spending rose only 1% in the second quarter from the prior year. These two categories represent 16% of U.S. media spending in the second quarter.
- If there isn't an economic slump nationwide, at least Detroit is poised for one.

Twenty-nine auto nameplates had collective ad growth of 6.4% for the first half to bring total automotive category ad volume to $1.59 billion. But of the total, the 15 Ford Motor Co., General Motors Corp. and Chrysler Corp. nameplates accounted for spending of $865.4 million, down 4.7% from their first-half contribution in 1989. Foreign-based auto marketers claimed $722.4 million for 14 nameplates, up 23.5%.

The Ford cars & trucks brand, ranked No. 5 overall, led auto marketers with $176.4 million in first-half advertising for a narrow 0.1% growth from year ago six-month figures. Toyota cars & trucks brand, No. 6 at $126.7 million, is accelerating at a much faster ad clip, though. The brand blew past Chevrolet, last year's No. 6, on the basis of a 29.5% first-quarter ad growth and a 32.4% second-quarter boost compared with prior-year periods.

Chevy, like Ford, is budgeting less media spending each quarter on a year-to-year basis. Its first-quarter total dropped 29.5% from prior year levels and the second fell 33.5%.

For the two half-year periods, auto advertising by the Top 200 declined 15% in magazines and 8% in spot TV.

Countering the notion that the wolf is at the door, however, was the relatively strong performance by the Top 200's retail (non-food) category. It grew 10.8% in the first half, well ahead of the 6% growth (to $2.65 billion) for all retail advertising in the first half.

Most retail spending growth was in network TV and magazines. The category's newspaper outlays—its biggest outlet by volume—advanced only 1.1%.

The Top 200's telephone services category left all others in its wake, however, surging 42.8% from the prior half-year to $337.2 million. The category has become overheated, not only by ad volume but by comparative campaigns and accusations that AT&T in particular is surreptitiously spiriting away customers from its competitors.

In the category, US Sprint grew 42% to $40.2 million, GTE telephone services advanced 37.4% to $14.9 million while MCI Communications watched from the sidelines, spending $28.6 million, down 8%. ☐

LETTERS

In defense of L.A. Gear

When I left a large public relations firm to start my own agency, one of my first clients was Sandy Saemann and L.A. Gear.

I resent the implication that Mr. Saemann is a difficult client and L.A. Gear doesn't hold agencies in high regard (AA, Nov. 5). My own relationship with the company has been characterized by communication and respect for nearly two years.

Mr. Saemann has proven he can run a successful company—L.A. Gear is the fastest growing major athletic shoe company, growing at a 40% rate in a terrible retail climate. To expect him to turn over the [creative] reins in one fell swoop is naive.

When L.A. Gear attempts to hold a "confidential" agency search and a significant number of the participants run to the advertising press to tell them the news; when agencies complain about producing four commercials by year's end; and when agencies compare L.A. Gear to Gallo, maybe then the advertising community can begin to understand L.A. Gear's frustration with the way many agencies run their businesses.

Pioneering in Moscow

Not to take away from the credit Ad Age deserves for its important two-day advertising/marketing seminar in Moscow, but that was not the first. There was also no "old Soviet taboo against advertising," nor did "perestroika reforms make this seminar possible." Far from "unprecendented," there were several, much-earlier, such seminars.

In 1968, George Gribbin (then ceo of Young & Rubicam), Alexander Brody (then head of international of Y&R) and I (then VP-special planning at Y&R) went to the Soviet Union.

(How our plane was diverted to Leningrad in a blinding snowstorm and how we managed to get to Moscow with no rubles on an overnight train with no sleeping accomodations is another story.)

In Moscow we addressed a seminar of about 60 people from Vneshtogreklama (the agency for advertising Soviet products outside the country), in the course of which we defined and discussed marketing, did slide presentations of several case histories, showed TV commercials and answered questions from a fascinated audience for an hour.

We are invited back in 1969 for more ambitious seminars. The climax was a seminar attended by about 500 people from all the advertising agencies, various ministries and journalism. . . . To say we were well-received is an understatement. We were greeted with long, enthusiastic applause. The question-and-answer session could have gone on for days but had to be cut short after an hour. We were treated as honored guests, stuffed with more food than we could eat and plied with vodka—and brandy at breakfast—which we learned how to gracefully refuse so we could continue on a vertical course.

Y&R's motive was to open an office in Moscow and use it not only for clients but to teach modern advertising to the Soviet adpeople. Many years later (can it be 21 years since we were there?) a Moscow Y&R office is a reality.

'Financial World' responds

I do not understand why Robert Paradise of Barron's incorrectly nitpicks a sales program that could save an advertiser $600,000 by running in Barron's and Financial World compared with Forbes' rates, and could put substantial dollars in Barron's pockets. Mr. Paradise (Letters, AA, Oct. 22) seems to completely misunderstand the essence of the FW/Barron's joint sale.

First, his protest that we are somehow brokering space for Barron's is a misrepresentation of both the Advertising Age story (AA, Oct. 8) and our program, which is simply a joint sale in which both FW and Barron's receive separate insertion orders.

His contention that his audience is more upscale than ours is also unusual given that, according to Simmons, only 21% of Barron's audience is managerial/administrative versus 31% for FW; and 20% of Barron's audience is not employed versus 14% for FW. I hope FW's audience never becomes so upscale.

Finally on the point of CPMs, at $58, Barron's has one of the highest in the business field, while FW's is $40.

Somebody wasn't listening

As a former employee of D'Arcy MacManus & Masius, pre-merger, I am guilty of referring to my alma mater as D'Arcy. However, after reading retired D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles Chairman John Bowen's fervent plea to discontinue using this incorrect reference ("Don't call us D'Arcy," Forum, AA, Oct. 29), I took an oath that from now on I would refer to the agency as DMB&B. I admit, I was also afraid of retribution from Mr. Bowen at some time during my life.

Apparently, though, your editors aren't quite as fearful, as evidenced by the article, "Ad message is crucial" on Page 52 of the same issue. I spotted not one but three references to "D'Arcy" in an article about a brand-leader study presented at the ANA meeting by, yes, Mr. Bowen. Oops! John Bowen certainly got his crucial message across, but somebody wasn't listening.

CORRECTIONS & CLARIFICATIONS

■ Due to a typographical error, the figure for PC Magazine's 1989 single-copy sales was incorrect in a chart titled "Shopper hot on the racks" (AA, Nov. 12, P. S-15). It should read 127,491.

■ Jerry Ward, former publisher of Traditional Home, was named a group VP-publishing director at Meredith Corp. and will be in charge of the company's Special Interest Publications, Craftways titles and Golf for Women. The new title was incorrectly given (AA, Oct. 29, P. 8).

■ Andy Hayes, a VP at the Tribune Co., made comments incorrectly attributed to Andy McKenna, a Tribune Co. director, in a story on the New York Daily News (AA, Nov. 5, P. 67). □

Garfield mislabeled Wisk

Bob Garfield in a recent column (AA, Oct. 22) says Lever Bros. is attempting to exploit the recent wave of environmental concern with advertising that points out that Wisk Power Scoop creates less waste than conventional detergents. Bob has the right to his opinion . . . but I would challenge his implication—that because Lever has not, at one blow, completely eliminated all the environmental effects of detergent use, the positive step they have taken is somehow unworthy of mention.

The basis of Wisk's environmental statements is that it is the most concentrated detergent in the U.S. This in itself reduces waste along with the significant additional benefit of requiring a cardboard box only one-third the size of conventional detergents. Incidentally, every Wisk box is made of recycled cardboard and every single scoop and handle is coded for recycling.

No one, least of all Lever Bros., is claiming this is more than a small step. But should a company be criticized for taking constructive action? Bob's complaint is that "the difference between large and small detergent boxes" is too minor to mention. Consider that we are talking about 75 million boxes. Add to that the hundreds of millions of concentrate boxes that will be sold by other detergent manufacturers. Together, these millions of little steps should add up to something quite significant indeed.

Bob writes that Lever is hailing itself as the Rachel Carson of package goods, when in fact the advertising copy—"It may not change the world, but it's a start"—could hardly be more modest. And the overwhelming number of consumers Lever showed it to liked it, believed it and considered it meaningful.

What I regret most about Bob's article is not that it criticizes Lever, but that it shows that the commercial didn't communicate to him the company's genuine concern for environmental issues. My solace is that so far, at least, American consumers are not confused about what Lever is saying about Wisk Power Scoop. Even better, they have shown a strong interest in trying this new product. Isn't that how advertising is supposed to work?

of Pacific Rim companies.

Third, and perhaps most worrisome, this way of doing business gets absorbed into our national psyche. Rather than being a can-do nation we become an almost-can-do nation. Gradually, we come to accept the Second Time Syndrome as the way things are done. It is no wonder we get clobbered so often in the marketplace.

So what's to be done? Simple: Make First Time Performance a corporate value. Companies need to value a consumer's time as much as they value a consumer's pocketbook. How? The usual easy-to-say, hard-to-do way: Top management identifies it as a goal, incentives are set up to reward achievement and programs are encouraged to develop creative ways to meet First Time objectives. Of course, companies don't have to develop programs to deal with this now. There's always a second chance, isn't there? □

GLOBAL MARKETING & MEDIA

Unilever, P&G, Nestle hold onto top spots

Anglo-Dutch giant spends $1.1 billion

By Nancy Giges

Unilever, Procter & Gamble Co. and Nestle held onto their respective slots as the three biggest advertisers outside the U.S. for the third consecutive year.

In Advertising Age's fourth survey of the 50 leading ad spenders outside the U.S., the Anglo-Dutch conglomerate kept its top ranking, doling out $1.1 billion in 25 countries in 1989.

However, in comparing spending to the previous year in countries where Ad Age has comparable data for both years, Unilever's spending declined 5.1%.

Cincinnati-based P&G spent $934 million in 18 countries outside the U.S., while Vevey, Switzerland-based Nestle chalked up $534.6 million in 19 nations.

Rounding out the top 10 are: Renault, Paris; Philip Morris Cos., New York; Fiat, Turin, Italy; Matsushita Electric Industrial Co., Osaka, Japan; PSA Peugeot-Citroen, Paris; Nissan Motor Co., Tokyo; and Volkswagen, Wolfsburg, Germany (see chart on Page S-4).

When U.S. ad spending is included, consumer goods giant P&G comes out on top with worldwide spending of $2.7 billion.

Philip Morris follows closely with $2.5 billion. Unilever and General Motors Corp., Detroit, tie for third with $1.7 billion each. The only other company exceeding the $1 billion mark in ad spending worldwide is Nestle with $1.1 billion.

Spending for the top 50 totaled $13.7 billion, up 10.5% from 1988 figures.

Newcomers to the top 50 list include Mazda Motor Corp., Hiroshima, Japan; Sony Corp., Tokyo; Ajinomoto Co., Tokyo; Shiseido Co., Tokyo; Mitsukoshi, Tokyo; Tokyo Electric Power, Tokyo; Matsushita Kogyo, Yokohama; Suzuki Motor Co., Hamamatsu, Japan; Seiyu, Tokyo; and Standa, Rome.

Dropping from the list are the British Government, London; BMW, Munich; Barilla, Parma, Italy; Gervais Danone, Levallois-Perret, France; RJR Nabisco, New York; Jacobs Suchard, Zurich; B.A.T Industries, London; British Telecom, London; Kingfisher, London; and Cole Myer, Sydney. Suchard, acquired by Philip Morris, is included in its parent's totals.

The number of Japan-based companies rose to 29, up from 20, while the U.S. number dropped to 10 from 11. Italy was represented by three, the Netherlands by 2½, Germany and France by two each, Switzerland by one and the U.K. by one-half. The split is the result of Unilever, which claims roots in the U.K. and the Netherlands.

Automakers top the list with 12 entries contributing $3.6 billion; followed by food companies with nine, contributing $2.3 billion; electronics companies with eight, contributing $2 billion; and soap marketers with six, at $3 billion.

On the list are six retailers, four beer companies and two utilities. Computer, photography and cosmetic marketers have one company each on the list.

Information for Ad Age's ranking of the top 50 spenders in non-U.S. advertising was compiled from data supplied from 38 major advertiser markets by Ad Age's international network and sources around the world (see "How to read these rankings" on Page S-10). □

Top circulation gains found in weeklies

AT&T, Canon among top advertisers

By R. Craig Endicott

Global weeklies, backed by their growing popularity in Europe and Asia/Pacific, led monthlies and dailies in average 1990 circulation growth, while dailies proved most cost-efficient for advertisers, holding down cost per thousand growth.

According to Advertising Age's sixth annual Global Marketing & Media survey covering 18 publications, weeklies were paced in circulation by the U.K.'s The Economist, with overall growth of 11.7% to 425,366.

Among all weeklies, Europe contributed 5.6% average growth, and Asia/Pacific 7.2%, as the category registered 3.2% average circulation growth overall compared with 2.3% for dailies.

AT&T Co. and Canon were the marketers named most frequently—five times each—as a top 10 advertiser by the 18 publishers. Luxury goods were listed 26 times as a top 10 advertiser. Automobiles at 23 and airlines and financial services at 22 each followed.

Dailies, with an average CPM growth of 4%, increased efficiencies more than the weeklies, whose average CPM growth was 10.3%. Paris-based International Herald Tribune paced the dailies with 1.2%. Contributing to the Tribune's cost-efficiency was a strong 4.1% circulation growth compared with a low 5.4% increase in a b&w full-page ad to $41,300.

Monthlies registered average CPM growth of 7%, a number distorted by WorldPaper's CPM uptick of 22.3%. WorldPaper also lost 18.2% in circulation to effect an average circulation decline of 2.8% for the group. Apart from this newspaper-distributed publication, monthlies' average circulation increase hit 1.1% and average CPM growth was 3.1%.

Reader's Digest dwarfed not only all monthlies but all publications in volume terms with circulation of 28.8 million, up 1.3%, and overall CPM of $9.47, up 3.8%.

North American editions dominated in circulation volume, with 44.9 million for all publications. Average circulation growth of 4.9% was held back by Newsweek and Time, with circulation declines of 1.9% and 2.9%, respectively. Those two, however, helped stimulate average circulation growth in the Asia/Pacific corridor, where all publications grew an average 7%.

Circulation growth was mixed in Latin America and Africa/Middle East. WorldPaper, with a worldwide circulation decline to 913,100, dropped 36.7% in Latin America from the demise of its 230,000-circulation Mexican edition. Its Mideast circulation also dropped 65.5%.

A large part of the average circulation growth of 4.7% in Europe is coming from new business in Central European markets. From the Soviet Union, Business Week drew 50,000 and WorldPaper 270,000.

This study includes global publications that are circulated on at least three continents, draw close to 10% of worldwide circulation from international editions and have centralized ad buying. □

Notes and sources: Advertising expenditures are in millions of U.S. dollars for year end 1989. In many countries, ad spending figures are estimates and/or gross figures. * indicates that U.S. spending figures include measured media only as reported by LNA/Arbitron Multi Media reports. All other U.S. spending figures include estimated unmeasured expenditures from AA's 100 Leading National Advertisers, Sept. 26, 1990. Non-U.S. ad spending includes only countries in the column headed "Countries in which spending was reported." Rankings of the top 10 advertisers in 38 countries begin on Page S-6. Pan Arabia includes Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar and Oman. For more information, see "How to read these rankings," Page S-10.

NEW STRATEGY FOR WORLD TECHNOLOGY MARKETS.

SPECTRUM magazine publishes, monthly, two highly efficient geographic advertising editions that deliver unprecedented technology market opportunities around the world—SPECTRUM EURO*PLUS*™ and PACIFIC*PLUS*™.

For over 25 years, SPECTRUM has been a recognized, highly respected international magazine. Reporting on cutting-edge technology to its knowledgeable audience of engineering and scientific professionals. Creating an award-winning editorial environment and technical coverage unmatched by any other magazine.

Our subscribers, residing in 145 countries, are influential, technically attuned professionals with strong representation at leading companies, educational and research institutions and government facilities. And they're all paid subscribers!

Reach the key high technology markets with EURO*PLUS*™.

SPECTRUM's new EURO*PLUS*™ geographic edition is a most effective way to support a strong marketing position with high level, influential penetration of Europe's fast growing technology marketplace.

You'll reach more than 54,000 technically-sophisticated executives and professionals in 76 countries. It's the largest single concentration of engineers/scientists and technical managers in Europe, the Near East, and Africa. The perfect answer for building product awareness and gaining advance access to the markets of 1992.

Strengthen your worldwide market presence with the PACIFIC*PLUS*™ Edition.

Our international subscribers represent the fastest growing segment of SPECTRUM's circulation. The PACIFIC*PLUS*™ edition delivers more than 74,000 readers in 68 countries. You'll reach an audience that's 100% engineers, scientists and technology managers in key positions in industry, government and education. The prime movers who make the high technology decisions that matter for their companies.

SPECTRUM EURO*PLUS*™ and PACIFIC*PLUS*™ reaffirm our ongoing commitment to our subscribers. Delivering the same essential, informative, worldclass editorial that is found in all editions of SPECTRUM.

Find out about the unparalleled high technology coverage, targeted marketing opportunities, and cost-efficient rates that are making these editions the leading choice of so many global marketers. Contact your IEEE SPECTRUM Magazine representative today.

How to read these rankings

Advertising Age's fourth annual ranking of major advertisers outside the U.S. and sixth annual Global Media lineup contain data from around the world.

Global Marketers

The advertiser ranking on Page S-4 includes media spending figures from 38 countries. Ad Age correspondents compiled the data. Depending on availability of reliable spending data, country lists ran from as many as 200 advertisers to only the top 10 spenders.

Research companies, media-tracking services, marketing publications and ad agencies supplied media totals available in their respective markets. All media is seldom tracked in any given country. In some cases, totals were discounted from rate card-based data to reflect market realities.

Sources are listed beneath tables titled "Top 10 advertisers in 38 countries" starting on Page S-6. All figures are given in U.S. dollars.

Source lines include currency conversion rates for both 1989 and 1988, unless research companies provided the figures in U.S. dollars.

Global Media

Circulation data collected from publishers in this report were for June 1990 compared with June 1989. Ad rates were those in effect at the same mid-year period.

Criteria for a publication's inclusion in the table on Page S-2 are:

- Substantial mass circulation on at least three continents.
- Worldwide circulation of at least 50,000 and circulation of international editions equal to at least 10% of the domestic circulation.
- Editorial content global in scope.
- Advertising in all editions purchased through a central office.

Trade publications aren't mass-circulation publications and are excluded from this listing.

Licensed publications are also excluded, because they lack central control on the advertising side. □

RETAILING.

Slump hits ad budgets

Poll: Retailers to squeeze tighter; print suffers

By Adrienne Ward

Never mind recession, retail advertising is starting to look like it's entering a depression.

According to a nationwide survey of 1,262 retailers, 64.9% of respondents said advertising as a percentage of sales for the fourth quarter will decrease or remain the same as last year.

Sales promotion budgets also are being squeezed, the survey indicates. Sixty-four percent of those surveyed said sales promotion as a percentage of sales will decrease or stay the same.

"There's nothing in [these results] that I would categorize as great news for anybody," said Harvey Braun, chairman of the Trade Retail & Distribution Services division of Deloitte & Touche, which conducted the survey. "This season is not going to be a boomer year no matter how you read those numbers."

The outlook for print media is particularly grim: 73.9% of respondents said they are allocating either the same amount or less of their ad budgets to newspaper run of press; 81.7% are spending the same or less on Sunday supplements; and 88.1% are allocating the same or less to magazines.

"Magazines look like the big loser here," he said. "Newspapers show a little bit of improvement but [they were down last year, so staying flat is not good]."

Newspapers rely on retail for roughly 50% of their ad expenditures. Newspaper Advertising Bureau expects total newspaper ad expenditure growth for the year to be less than 1%.

Deloitte & Touche found 82.3% of retailers believe the U.S. is in a recession now, and 70.5% think next year will be worse.

Mr. Braun said 77.9% of retailers think industry profits will be lower this year.

The survey brings even worse tidings for the coming holiday season: "97.5% of retailers said consumers will not spend more during the 1990 holiday season than they did last year. "And last year put a very great many retailers on the ragged edge," he said.

To help their bottom lines, many retailers are reducing inventory levels (AA, Oct. 15): 21.5% reported they are trimming back, while 12.8% are offering more exclusive merchandise assortments.

"Lower inventory is going to make a big difference," Mr. Braun said. "What's happening this year is more a function of retailers risking lost sales vs. the impact of having excessive inventories after Christmas."

Unfortunately, the markdown-mania of the past few years shows no signs of abating.

"I've just been in Atlanta, and there are stores there that already have 50% off outerwear now, just because it's so important not to get stuck with the inventory," Mr. Braun said. "It becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy."

According to the survey, 27.5% of respondents plan to take major markdowns earlier than last year, and 67.9% expect to make them at the same time—which also was early.

"It's already a very tough season. The Persian Gulf, the economy—these have a whirlpool effect.

"There's even more potential for a shakeout next year," Mr. Braun added. □

RETAIL DETAILS

Shuttered: Retail failures increased 12.5% to 9,732 in the first nine months of 1990, according to Dun & Bradstreet Corp. Hardest hit were New England, which closed 1,562 retail establishments, up 129% from the same period last year; and the Middle Atlantic region, with 1,242 retail failures this year, a 55.4% rise. "Every industry and every state in these two regions reported sharp increases in business failures, reflecting economic stress througout the Northeast," said Joseph Duncan, corporate economist and chief statistician for D&B.

Wal-Mart opens new doors: Wal-Mart Stores is testing a new discount warehouse concept that offers manufacturers' overruns and factory closeout items. Bud's Warehouse Outlet stores have opened in West Memphis, Ark., and Franklin, Tenn. Two stores are planned for Talladega, Ala., and Houma, La.

Separately, Wal-Mart Stores has reached an agreement to acquire Wholesale Club. If the merger is approved by the chain's shareholders, Wholesale Club's 27 locations eventually will be converted to Wal-Mart's Sam's Wholesale Clubs.

Reebok steps into retail: Reebok International will open two retail stores in the next year as a "merchandising laboratory" for the shoe marketer. The company is scheduled to open one store soon on Newbury Street in Boston. It will open another store in Santa Monica, Calif., in early 1991.

Bernadette Mansur, VP-marketing communications for Reebok, said a modest amount of local advertising would announce the store openings and would most likely be handled by Boston-based Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos.

Hot colors: What's hot? Red, white and blue—and green.

J.C. Penney Co.'s children's division reports brisk sales of clothing items featuring the American flag or patriotic symbols. Clothing with environmental messages, such as "Save our wildlife" or "Preserve our rainforests," also are widely popular. Levi, JG Hook, Cotler and Bugle Boy are among marketers promoting environmental awareness. Great American Licensing, Topico Bay and Wild Oats are touting clothing with patriotic messages.

Signs of the times

Retailers respond to new in-store media

By Scott Hume

New in-store media are making inroads among retailers, but still face some resistance.

Use of manufacturer-supplied point-of-purchase signs and displays is at traditionally high levels. But retailers—especially supermarkets—also are opening their doors to newer, vendor-controlled in-store media, such as shopping cart ads, in-store radio and electronic signage.

The Point-of-Purchase Advertising Institute's 1990 Attitudes on POP Survey, released last month, measures use of and attitudes toward in-store signage, displays and media by 414 store-level managers and headquarters executives for supermarkets, liquor and package goods stores, and home improvement stores.

Use of manufacturer-supplied signage and displays was high. Among home improvement stores, 99.1% of 108 managers said they use promotional POP materials, and 74.1% said they use permanent materials. At supermarkets, 96.6% of 148 managers use promotional and 58.8% use permanent signs and displays. Among liquor stores, 97.5% of 158 managers use promotional displays; 69.9% use permanent manufacturer-supplied displays.

Such displays and signage long have been mainstays of in-store promotional marketing. But new in-store media, controlled by independent vendors rather than manufacturers, have gained acceptance (see chart).

The most widely used vendor-supplied media so far are shelf talkers and, at supermarkets at least, shopping cart ads. Only supermarket managers say they use electronic signs (4%) but were the only managers not to use banners. Among home improvement store managers, 2.1% use banners; 6.5% of liquor store managers do.

Supermarket managers were the least enthusiastic about in-store media's ability to attract consumer attention.

Vendor-controlled in-store media were rated "extremely effective" attention getters by 8.1% of supermarket managers, compared with 21.3% of liquor store managers and 9.7% of home improvement store managers.

By comparison, 18.9% of supermarket managers rated manufacturer-supplied signs and displays "extremely effective" in attracting consumer attention. At home improvement stores, it was 16.7%. Only at liquor stores were traditional signs and displays received less enthusiastically (7.6%) than vendor-controlled media (21.3%).

Questions about in-store media's effectiveness with consumers may be one reason many managers don't expect to start using those media. More than half (53.1%) of the liquor store managers not using in-store media said they don't expect to use them in the future; 18.9% said they will; 27% are undecided; and 1% had no answer.

Among supermarket managers not using in-store media, expectations for future use were higher (20.4%), while 40.8% said they won't use them and 38.8% were undecided. Among home improvement store managers, 44.2% are undecided on likely future use, 40.3% said they won't and 14.3% expect they will.

POPAI's study was conducted last spring by Ehrhart-Babic Group, Englewood Cliffs, N.J. Retailers with the highest sales in each of 15 markets were interviewed in person. The margin of error is plus or minus 8.5%. []

AD REVIEW

Burger King breaks the rules of fair play, free speech defense

(Rating: No stars)

By Bob Garfield

Garfield

Sometimes you gotta be a jerk. Sometimes you gotta have no spine. Sometimes you gotta break the rules.

Assorted public relations reverses lately have pushed Burger King Corp. and D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, to tactical newspaper advertising that smacks of cheap opportunism and craven capitulation. The ads are breaking the rules, all right. Chief among them: If you don't have something worthwhile to say, don't say anything at all.

The first ad followed McDonald's Corp.'s highly publicized abandonment of polystyrene foam packaging, a move of dubious environmental—but monumental symbolic—significance. Maybe the worldwide front-page news coverage left Burger King feeling neglected, or maybe the company was grasping for some thin reed of competitive advantage when it bought page ads in the big national dailies.

—"Burger King applauds McDonald's for its new environmental consciousness.

Two tactical print ads from Burger King and D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, attempt to suggest corporate moral righteousness and project precisely the opposite.

Welcome to the club. We wonder what the planet would be like if you had joined us in 1955."

And I wonder what in the world they're talking about. Burger King's use of paper packaging in 1955 obviously had nothing to do with with preserving the environment. As for the intervening years, there's no evidence that waste disposal has been an issue there until right now—when Burger King's all-consuming green consciousness involves not-yet-started pilot composting projects in exactly three of its markets.

It's disturbing enough that McDonald's was pressured by activist groups and consumer perception to abandon heat-retaining foam before the relative ecomerits of paper and plastic were certain. But it's contemptible that Burger King would exploit the confusion with a gratuitous, disingenuous, heavy-handed and graceless little dig.

Burger King is every bit the instant-gratification archetype of the consumer society that McDonald's is. Both sell plastic food from plastic palaces, and neither should be ashamed of doing it. That millions of satisfied customers line up each day to be systematically polymerized by various versions of Atherosclerosis on a Bun is a triumph of capitalism. But to suggest that somehow moral superiority reigns at the Home of the Whopper is not only insufferably smug, it's ludicrous.

Public righteousness, though, is becoming this company's favorite theme. You may recall a year ago when, after devastating natural disasters in San Francisco and the Carolinas, Burger King ostentatiously offered to send a quarter to the disaster relief fund for every Whopper sold—perhaps the single most vulgar display of false philanthropy in the checkered history of cause marketing. Then came the McDonald's packaging flap and, in the very same week, this newspaper ad:

"An Open Letter To The American People. Burger King wishes to go on record as supporting traditional American values on television, especially the importance of the family. We believe the American people desire television programs that reflect the values they are trying to instill in their children. We pledge to support such programs with our advertising dollars. BURGER KING CORPORATION."

You can feel nothing but sympathy for Burger King for being preyed upon by a few Tupelo, Miss., scolds who have organized consumer boycotts under the banner of CLeaR-TV, or Christian Leaders for Responsible Television. The group would be better named ExtORT-TV, or Extremely Overbearing Religious Troublemakers, intent as it is to sanitize the media of homosexuality, bosoms, talking back to Dad and other threats to our way of life.

But not only has Burger King negotiated with these idea terrorists, it has employed the very sanctimonious Tupelospeak of the zealots themselves. The tortured ad copy brings to mind those spontaneous stinging broadsides on U.S. policy delivered by unshaven, emaciated hostages as videotaped by their terrorist captors. "With the angry bubbling of my blood I outrageously implore you, excellency Bush, to desist with dastardly conspiracy action underneath the flesh of the Palestine hero people!"

Burger King's submitting to these self-anointed censors is cowardly, offensive and —above all—a slur against the most important of American values, which is freedom of expression. The ad makes a mockery of the First Amendment. And that's one rule no advertiser should ever break. □

The rating system uses four stars to represent excellent, three for notable, two for mediocre and one for pathetic.

Election may aid ad industry issues

By Janet Meyers

WASHINGTON—This month's election results will have an impact on how some issues important to the ad industry are handled in the coming year.

"The dust is still settling," said Dan Jaffe, exec VP at the Association of National Advertisers, but changes in the makeup of the House Energy & Commerce Committee may affect proposals to restrict tobacco and alcohol advertising, which came out of that panel in the past year.

One of the biggest changes comes with the retirement of Rep. Thomas A. Luken, chairman of the Energy & Commerce Subcommittee on Transportation & Hazardous Materials, which has Federal Trade Commission oversight. Rep. Luken (D., Ohio) is a proponent of banning tobacco ads.

"As each slot is filled, you'll have a different transformation," Mr. Jaffe said of the vacancies that will occur.

Wally Snyder, exec VP at the American Advertising Federation, said the changes will be an improvement for the ad industry.

"I think we'll have an opportunity to have a better relationship with that committee," he said of Energy & Commerce.

But the coming year will see ad industry lobbyists wrestling again with tobacco advertising, which Rep. Henry Waxman (D., Calif.), sponsor of key legislation, has promised to reintroduce.

State activity also is likely to be rampant, with more proposals to tax advertising.

"States have a lot more revenue problems," Mr. Snyder said. "1991 will be a very challenging year. . . . We've been preparing our members." □

our sales are," said Rod Eaton, director of sales promotion at Target, which has 420 stores in 32 states. "This year our heavier campaign ought to drive more of those people who aren't going to department stores to Target."

Wal-Mart declined to discuss ad plans or Christmas outlook, but analysts predict the mass merchandiser will fare well this holiday season due to its wide perception as a company with the lowest prices available on general merchandise. GSD&M, Austin, Texas, is Wal-Mart's agency.

K mart is also expected to reap good sales during the holiday season, due to its high concentration of lower-price soft merchandise. The No. 2 retailer broke a print campaign last week supported by holiday-themed TV spots (AA, Nov. 12).

"Consumers are trading downward in the current economy, and retailers with a high concentration of expensive merchandise and big-ticket items are likely to get hurt this year, said L. Wayne Hood, retail analyst with Prudential Research.

Sears, Roebuck & Co., Montgomery Ward & Co. and major electronics retailers, including Circuit City and Highland Superstores, could be hurt as sales of big-ticket durables, electronics and appliances stagnate, Mr. Hood said.

"Certain types of stores will be less adversely affected by what's going on in the market," said Kurt Barnard, a retail forecaster and publisher of Retail Marketing Report. He said formats such as factory outlets and off-price retailers ought to fare better.

But analysts agree that any retailer with aggressive marketing programs is likely to survive the tough season better.

Sears, the nation's largest retailer, declined to reveal its expectations for the holiday season. The company will offer "some special deals and limited-time offers on certain merchandise" throughout the holiday season, said Kathy Gucfa, public relations specialist for the Sears Merchandise Group, but no specifics are yet available. The sale items won't necessarily be advertised, she said.

Sears this week starts airing holiday TV and print ads themed "Your Christmas store and a whole lot more," via Ogilvy & Mather, Chicago.

The 61-unit Department Store Division of Dayton Hudson has also planned a more conservative holiday campaign, using "Sharing the holidays with you"-themed ads created in-house and used last year, said Becky Bailey, public relations manager.

Five Sunday newspaper circulars will drop in Dayton Hudson's core markets of Minneapolis (Dayton's), Detroit (Hudson's) and Chicago (Marshall Field's).

The company will again offer its 6-year-old plush "Santabear" for $17.50 with any purchase totaling $50. Field's will offer its 5-year-old plush "Mistletoe Bear" for $30.

Jordan Marsh Stores Corp., New England's largest department store chain, this year is resurrecting its Enchanted Village, a 6,000-square-foot scaled-down re-creation of a New England town on Christmas Eve in the year 1910; it was last used in the early '70s.

A 30-second TV commercial, created in-house, will run Nov. 18 through Dec. 5 or 6 on network affiliates in Boston. A print ad announcing the grand opening of the village ran Nov. 18 in The Boston Globe.

Antacid wars lead to arrest

PHILADELPHIA—FBI agents last week arrested Rebecca Lindquester, 42, co-owner of Horizon Productions, Newtown Square, Pa., charging her with trying to sell proprietary marketing information on SmithKline Beecham's Tagamet antacid to Glaxo, which markets the competitive Zantac. Ms. Lindquester is said to have approached Glaxo in September and sought $500,000 for marketing campaign information detailing a new use for Tagamet. Her company, which she owns with her husband David, had been asked by SmithKline to bid on a contract to produce a videotape that would train sales representatives on the new use for Tagamet.

MCI calls on Messner in battle against AT&T

By Jon Lafayette

MCI Communications Corp. has enlisted Messner Vetere Berger Carey Schmetterer, New York, to join its fierce uphill marketing battle against AT&T Co.

Messner, a 4-year-old agency whose billings will nearly double after adding the long-distance phone company's $51 million account, replaces Wells, Rich, Greene, which had handled MCI since 1987.

To help pitch the account, Messner called in Roger Ailes, a political consultant known for his combative campaign style.

The agency, 51% owned by French agency group RSCG Group, was a long-shot late-starter in a costly review that in addition to WRG included BBDO Worldwide; Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver; and Hal Riney & Partners, all New York; and Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston.

"We chose Messner based on their creative strength and their knowledge of the long-distance telephone industry," said Pam Small, public relations manager for MCI.

Executives at Messner had worked on MCI while the account was at Ally & Gargano, New York, in the early 1980s and reportedly maintained relationships with MCI staffers who became decision-makers during the company's latest reorganization.

WRG executives said management changes at MCI doomed their chance of keeping the account.

Messner Partner Ron Berger acknowledged that famil-

Colgate axes global ads; thinks local

By Laurie Freeman

Colgate-Palmolive Co.'s shift to a country-by-country ad strategy will be a basic element in the company's long-term growth plans, Chairman-CEO Reuben Mark told securities analysts last week.

Executives attending the meeting said Mr. Mark stated Colgate will emphasize in-depth international marketing of its major brands—Colgate, Palmolive, Fab and Ajax.

Doug Goodman

R. Mark

The localized ad strategy is markedly different from that pursued by Clay Timon, Colgate's former VP-director of worldwide advertising.

Mr. Timon, who advocated global advertising, resigned in September after Colgate decided to decentralize the advertising function and turn responsibilities over to individual operating units.

Colgate's advertising and marketing in the '90s will be tailored specifically to local markets and countries, said industry analysts contacted by Advertising Age. There will be little, if any, global advertising, these sources said.

To underscore that point, they said, TV commercials from different countries were shown and no two were alike.

Colgate executives declined comment; when contacted by phone, Mr. Mark said he wouldn't discuss the meeting.

Although Colgate didn't discuss specific ad budgets, noting only that advertising as a percentage of sales is likely to increase, securities analysts said the company intends to further pare promotional spending and pump those dollars into media advertising.

Colgate, whose measured media spending fell 10% through the first half of 1990 compared with last year, is expected to post U.S. ad spending of $222 million this year. Colgate spent $246.3 million on advertising in the U.S. last year. Advertising Age estimates Colgate spent $257 million outside the U.S. in '89, a budget expected to maintain a pace similar to U.S. spending for 1991 to 1995.

According to industry analysts, Mr. Mark said Colgate

CAUTIOUS KICKOFF

Shoppers swarm stores, but rein in spending

An Advertising Age roundup

Consumers crowded into retail stores last Friday, the official kickoff of the holiday selling season, but cautious shoppers didn't go on a spending spree.

Many retailers, including R.H. Macy & Co., Abraham & Straus, Bloomingdale's and Saks Fifth Avenue, reported heavy traffic the day after Thanksgiving, traditionally one of the biggest shopping days of the year.

But, while most retailers said the cash registers were ringing, industry experts and an informal survey of shoppers conducted throughout the day by Advertising Age indicated that overriding concerns about the economy and the Middle East are causing consumers to hold back.

"Most people are scaling back their budgets," said Kurt Barnard, a New York-based retail forecaster and publisher of The Retail Marketing Report. "Yes, people will be out and people will be buying today, but many are browsing and shopping carefully. [If they are buying] they are buying bargains."

"Most people are scaling back their budgets. . . . many are browsing and shopping carefully. [If they are buying] they are buying bargains."

Mr. Barnard, who said sales were slower last Friday compared with a year ago, predicted most consumers "will buy fewer items this year, and the average amount for each [item] will be lower."

Philip Brous, professor of retailing at Columbia University's Graduate School of Business, summed up this year's gift shopper as "cautious. The stores are always mobbed the day after Thanksgiving, but I think sales will be lighter than a year ago."

He added that fourth quarter 1990 retail sales may show declines compared to 1989 when they were up slightly over 1988.

Several retailers acknowledged a slowdown in consumer spending.

"A lot [of consumers] are looking. . . . a few are buying," said John Grounds, a Radio Shack store manager in Arlington, Texas.

"It's slower than the previous

Survivor testifies in Chilko lawsuit

By Ira Teinowitz

CHICAGO—DDB Needham Worldwide launched its defense in a civil suit stemming from the 1987 Chilko River tragedy last week, after a U.S. District Court jury heard graphic testimony about the accident from John W. Collins, retired former president of Clorox Co.

Mr. Collins alone remained on board a raft after it struck a rock in the whitewater accident in British Columbia, dumping 11 others into the river. Five died.

The wrongful-death lawsuit now being heard was filed by the family of James Fasules, who died in the accident. He was a retired DDB Needham senior VP-management representative.

The family is claiming the trip was sponsored by DDB Needham and that the agency failed to take adequate care in choosing a guide, overseeing the trip and explaining the dangers to the men taking it.

DDB Needham contends the trip was organized for friends by Al Wolfe, the now-retired former president of its U.S. division.

Last week, the agency presented one witness before it started its defense. The trial resumes today.

Ken Stewart, British Columbia's manager of outdoor recreation, testified that at the time of the accident, the province's only licensing and safety requirements had been drawn up by an industry committee that included Ron Thompson, the guide hired by the agency.

DDB Needham this week is expected to contend Mr. Thompson's procedures were common on the river at the time and that Mr. Thompson was a respected guide.

Earlier in the week, Mr. Collins testified to the turmoil immediately after the accident; his being unable to rescue Mr. Fasules; and his successful rescue of Earl Madsen, an attorney.

Mr. Collins told the jury that immediately after the accident, he could see the men who had been thrown from the raft, including Robert Goldstein, VP-advertising at Procter & Gamble Co., who appeared dead or semiconscious (Mr. Goldstein drowned). Then he saw Mr. Fasules.

"His eyes were moving," Mr. Collins said during questioning by Brian L. Crowe, an attorney for the Fasules family.

"And his eyes were saying to you, 'Please help me'?" Mr. Crowe asked.

"That is the way I interpreted it," Mr. Collins responded.

J. Collins

"He couldn't raise up his arms or wouldn't because the life jacket was up pretty high on him?" Mr. Crowe asked.

"I don't know whether it was wouldn't or couldn't, but his arms were not up. His arms were underwater," Mr. Collins said.

"And you grasped his [life] jacket. You saw that all you were doing was pulling it higher?" Mr. Crowe asked.

"It already appeared to be too high on his body, and when I pulled on it I moved it further up his body," Mr. Collins said.

"You realized that you couldn't help him, so you let go?" Mr. Crowe asked.

"Yes, sir," responded Mr. Collins, who next saw Mr. Fasules when he identified his body that night.

Mr. Collins said Michael Miles, then president of Kraft Inc.; Art Zykiel, president of Merrill Lynch Assets Management; and Mr. Thompson were able to scramble out of the water quickly. Mattel Exec VP Joseph Morrison also got out.

Mr. Collins said he was almost unable to rescue Mr. Madsen, who had grabbed the raft but couldn't get in.

"The raft was spinning around, and I was unable to control it," Mr. Collins said ". . . I later found out it was because Mr. Madsen was holding onto the side and acting like a kind of anchor. . . . He is a big man, and I don't have a great deal of upper-body strength."

After securing the raft, Mr. Collins was able to help Mr. Madsen. He immediately saw that Mr. Madsen seemed to be suffering from hypothermia.

"He was shivering uncontrollably. . . . so I took off my life jacket and took off his life jacket and took off my shirt and took off his shirt and cut away . . . the hood of his windbreaker. And then I embraced him on the shore—with, you know, naked torsos—and after just a few minutes, he started to get warm and I started to get cold, so it had worked."

The two then crawled up a 200-foot bank and walked along the river for more than 2 hours before being spotted by a helicopter.

In other testimony last week, Les Bechdel, an Idaho river guide and author of a book on river safety, said Mr. Thompson failed to exercise even minimal whitewater industry safety standards for the major stretch of rapids.

Mr. Bechdel said those on the trip should have received extensive emergency safety instructions, worn wet suits and perhaps helmets, and been on several rafts instead of one.

Instead, he said, the outfitter used one raft and apparently gave few safety instructions and didn't properly check life jackets. Mr. Bechdel said proper instructions would have assured Mr. Fasules' life jacket had remained in proper position and let Mr. Collins know there were ways to pull him into the raft without lifting him.

Also killed in the accident were Richard O'Reilly, national director, Media-Advertising Partnership for a Drug-Free America; and two DDB Needham senior VPs, Stuart Sharpe and Gene Yovetich. □

Thatcher exit may boost ads

By Sean Kelly

LONDON—Advertising executives and analysts here were cautiously optimistic about the future of the U.K. ad industry after the decision last week of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher to resign.

Mrs. Thatcher's three election victories during her 11 years in office were engineered by Saatchi & Saatchi Co., which became famous for the high-profile account. Saatchi resigned the Conservative Party business in 1987 after her final victory.

A Saatchi official who didn't want to be identified declined to predict whether Saatchi would work again for the Conservatives.

"At this point, we just couldn't say," the official said. "We may or may not be on a pitch list. It's one of those things you don't necessarily know beforehand."

Advertising executives generally said they weren't overly concerned about which of the three candidates becomes the next prime minister. The contenders are Chancellor of the Exchequer John Major, Foreign Secretary Douglas Hurd and Michael Heseltine, the former defense minister who mounted the challenge that toppled Mrs. Thatcher.

M. Thatcher

Ad executives said all three are unlikely to make radical changes. They did, however, express concern about how the new prime minister would tackle the current U.K. recession, which is causing ad spending to plunge.

Of the three candidates, Mr. Heseltine has the closest connection to the ad industry. He's a major shareholder in Haymarket Publishing Group, which owns U.K. advertising trade magazine Campaign. Mr. Heseltine and Saatchi Chairman Maurice Saatchi worked together 20 years ago when Mr. Saatchi had his first job in project development at Haymarket.

"Advertising agencies will be looking to the new prime minister to get the economy back on course," said Adrian Birchall, vice chairman of D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles. "If the interest rates come down, mortgage rates come down and consumer spending will increase. That's one of the two main factors that affect advertising budgets."

Mr. Birchall said the new government will probably continue Mrs. Thatcher's policy of large government ad budgets.

Mrs. Thatcher will leave office this week after a new prime minister is chosen by the 372 members of Parliament belonging to the Conservative Party. The Conservatives don't have to call an immediate general election but must do so within the next 18 months. They will be challenged by the opposition Labor Party, and it can be expected that both parties will break major ad campaigns. Neither has an official ad agency of record. □

McD's beats politics

By Kate Fitzgerald

McDonald's Corp. won first place in last month's survey of advertising awareness, thanks to its "McMillions on NBC" contest promotion with NBC.

For the second consecutive month, McDonald's was No. 1 among the top 10 best-recalled advertisers in Advertising Age's monthly AdWatch survey.

The McDonald's-NBC $35.5 million cash giveaway promotion broke in early October and aired throughout the month, supported by ads for both McDonald's and NBC. TV spots were handled in-house by NBC or by McDonald's agency Leo Burnett USA, Chicago.

AD AGE GALLUP SURVEY

Politics dominated the local ad scene in October, as political ads for the Nov. 6 election ranked second among the top 10.

Automobiles placed third again, proving that escalating oil prices haven't slowed the pace of automobile ads. Chevrolet placed fourth among the top 10, up two slots from the previous survey.

Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser and Bud Light brands tied for fifth place in the survey with Pepsi-Cola, moving up from 10th place in the previous survey. Ford slid to seventh from its fifth place finish in September.

AT&T returned to the top 10 after a three-month hiatus, placing eighth thanks to higher awareness from its "Get it in writing" advertising from N W Ayer, New York. AT&T was among the top 10 from last April through June, due to the launch of its Universal credit card.

Coca-Cola's awareness slipped sharply in the latest survey, to ninth place from second in September, repeating the experience Pepsi-Cola had one month ago. Both cola marketers ended their heaviest ad campaigns of the year on Labor Day, though Diet Coke was advertised through September.

Nike continued to stroll down the charts as its back-to-school advertising tapered off, putting the shoe marketer at the bottom of the top 10. Nike placed fourth in September's survey and was second in August.

In aided awareness, Buick was among the top 5 best-recalled car and truck advertisers for the second time this year, placing fourth. Chevrolet led the category with 21.4%, followed by Ford with 20.8%, Toyota with 8.3%, Buick with 3.8% and Chrysler with 3.6%.

Dr Pepper also resurfaced in aided awareness of soft drink advertisers. Pepsi-Cola led the soft-drink category with 39% awareness, followed by Coca-Cola with 34.2%, Diet Coke with 6.7%, Dr Pepper with 5.1% and 7UP with 1.5%. Dr Pepper was last mentioned in aided awareness of soft drinks in February.

AdWatch is a joint project of Ad Age and the Gallup Organization. Advertising awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample to name the first advertising that comes to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days. Last month, 1,000 adults were polled by phone. The survey's margin of error is plus or minus 3.1%. □

Lid to clamp down hard on media pricing

Most 1991 media costs won't climb past 4%, Coen says

Media buyers, look at the percentage to the left. Memorize it. Blow it up to poster size and hang it on your wall.

You have just seen your benchmark for 1991 media negotiations.

Media cost maven Robert Coen, senior VP-director of forecasting at McCann-Erickson Worldwide, says cost-per-thousand and unit cost increases for most media will average about 4% in 1991.

Wary of the economic uncertainty, advertisers are holding firm on media price increases—and media are falling in line.

Mr. Coen had predicted 1990 media cost increases would match the Consumer Price Index. Following the Middle East crisis, increasingly pessimistic economic indicators and the soft ad market, Mr. Coen now says final 1990 unit cost increases will lag behind the index.

And he's not too gung-ho on 1991. "Now we are even less optimistic about the outlook for improving ad demand. The lid on media price rises will be screwed down even tighter, and in 1991 media price hikes are expected to lag behind inflation," he says.

This year, the CPM increases for network and spot radio, outdoor and direct mail all fell below inflation. In 1991, Mr. Coen predicts the CPMs of only two media—direct mail and cable TV—will top the expected 5% inflation rate.

Direct mail, about to be bludgeoned by an impending postal rate increase, is the most notable exception at 8%.

Cable, which exacted stunning increases in recent years of 12% to 15%, will see unit cost and CPM increases tumble to a more comparable 6%.

The big loser in 1991 is network TV, which commanded the greatest CPM increase of all media in 1990 at 8% for all TV and 9% for prime time.

An anticipated prime-time CPM increase of 6% is explained more as a result of audience drops than cost increases. Prime-time unit costs are increasing only 2%.

In the worst showing by a medium since network radio's unit costs dropped 2% in 1988, Mr. Coen predicts network TV will be the only medium that won't be able to sell buyers on a cost increase next year. □

TV buyers go gunning for guarantees

Upfront placements in jeopardy if Big 3 fool with buyers' rules

By Wayne Walley

A potential clash between advertisers and the Big 3 networks over ratings guarantees could jeopardize next year's upfront buying season.

Many believe if the Big 3 again insist on including an alternative viewer-counting method in their ratings guarantees, the TV marketplace and the relationship between buyers and sellers will change dramatically.

"The whole question of buying upfront next year has to be seriously considered," says Allen Banks, exec VP-media director, Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York.

"You commit when you know you will get what you expect. Then it makes sense to advertise upfront," he says. "If guarantees are less than solid and the networks deal with you differently, then the ways business operates have to change, and they are changing."

ABC, CBS and NBC insisted on implementing a controversial viewer-counting formula as part of upfront deals last summer.

This plan would ease network responsibility to provide advertisers with make-goods—free ad time to compensate for shows that don't deliver a promised rating—if TV usage levels reported by Nielsen Media Research inexplicably drop again this year.

Recent Nielsen numbers reveal a continued loss of network viewership. In September, the Big 3 captured 62% of the prime-time audience, compared with 65% the previous September. Late-night network audiences declined even more, from 56% to 51%.

Larry Hoffner, exec VP-sales for NBC, says the NBC-devised formula was merely a self-defense mechanism to protect the networks against potential irregularities in Nielsen's figures.

"We did this with mixed emotions," Mr. Hoffner says. "We hope to see the whole year come through without any glitches or stuff that's unexplainable in the numbers reported by Nielsen. We are all hoping to get back to doing business as usual."

Those in the buying community expect the networks to push for more ratings guarantee concessions during next year's upfront selling season.

"Compromising guarantees is a long-term network goal," says Gene DeWitt, president of DeWitt Media, New York. "The networks will keep working at it. They will

OCTOBER AD RESULTS

Fourth quarter looks grim

By Scott Donaton

The fourth quarter isn't likely to bring a turnaround for the magazine industry.

Ad pages dipped 6% to 17,744 in October, compared with the same month in 1989, Publishers Information Bureau reports. For January to October, ad pages in PIB-tracked titles totaled 140,252.8, a 3.7% decline from the same period last year.

Most surprising, perhaps, was the October dip in ad revenues, which have been rising this year despite the ad page falloff. Ad revenues for the month reached $712.4 million, a 2.5% decline. Ad revenues through October totaled $5.5 billion, a 1.8% gain.

Automotive revenues dipped in October after three consecutive months of double-digit gains. The industry's largest category was off 2.1% with revenues of $91.6 million. For the 10 months, auto revenues remained flat at $718 million, a 0.07% decline.

Food and food products revenues took an unexpected 21.7% plunge in October to $38.3 million. Revenues in the category remained strong for the 10-month period, however, at $373.7 million, up 4.7%.

Cigarette/tobacco spending continued its downward spiral with revenues of $27.4 million in October, down 23.8%. Year-to-date tobacco revenues were off 26.6% at $244.7 million.

Magazine Publishers of America Exec VP James Guthrie said the October results reflect not only softness in magazine spending but the strength of October 1989, a month in which seven of the top 10 categories showed double-digit increases over the same month in 1988.

By comparison, five of the top 10 categories were down last month and just two—computers/office equipment/stationery ($44.5 million, up 17%) and retail ($30 million, up 27.2%)—registered significant gains.

This year's October ad pinch hit a number of magazines that seemed immune to the drought. Forbes' ad pages fell 12.1% to 697 in October, leaving the every-other-weekly up 0.6% with 3,182.18 pages in 10 months.

Good Housekeeping was the only one of the "Seven Sisters" women's service titles up in ad pages this year. But the Hearst Corp. monthly carried 162 ad pages in October, down 2.4%. In the first 10 months of 1990, it carried 1,387.04 ad pages, up 5.2%.

PIB's January-October data paint a bleak picture for many titles, including a number of magazines that were considered among the industry's hottest during the 1980s.

American Health's ad pages fell 42.7% through October to 353.1. The Cable Guide was off 25.7% with 276.7 ad pages. Mother Earth News carried 301.6 ad pages, a 21.1% drop.

Women's magazines have been the hardest hit by the ad page squeeze. Family Circle, last year's women's service leader, saw ad pages fall 16.9% to 1,347.13. McCall's, with 807.2 ad pages, was down 13% from the same period in 1989, and Woman's Day was down 21.8% with 1,163.62 ad pages.

Ladies' Home Journal's ad pages were down just 4% to 1,214.87, a fairly strong performance in a weak field.

Among other women's books on the slide: Cosmopolitan (1,768.28, down 9.3%); Glamour (1,556.03, down 6.1%); Mademoiselle (1,275.92, down 7.6%); New Woman (788.91, down 5.9%); and Savvy Woman (307.9, down 30.9%).

A handful of magazines continued to buck the trend, registering strong gains after 10 months.

The North American edition of The Economist carried 2,201.12 ad pages, up 13.7%. Mirabella's ad pages totaled 885.76, a 79.2% jump. Art & Antiques' 684.56 ad pages were up 12.3% over the same period in 1989. Parenting saw pages rise 18.2% to 624.67. Decorating Remodeling's ad pages soared 75.9% to 360.5. And Cooking Light was up 14.9% with 295 ad pages. □

ADREVIEW

Trident commercial stumbles onto concept that sticks out

(Rating: ★ ★ ★)

By Bob Garfield

Garfield

We here at ADREVIEW are not by nature violent. Over the years, we have encountered very few individuals who, without extreme provocation, we would actually kill or maim (which may not seem to be all that remarkable a declaration, unless you know that once we were that close to Edwin Meese).

Sometimes we get exercised, yes, to the very edge of physical violence; that's the price of having cable service. But seldom does our disapproval cross what you might call the Keating Line, a moral threshold that can be expressed as follows:

We would not feel comfortable actually assassinating somebody accused of participating in a multibillion-dollar fraud that bankrupted a nation and robbed small depositors of their life's savings, but, if such a person were to step off a curb and be struck by a cross-town bus, we would not run to dial 911 so quickly as to risk scuffing our shoes.

The Keating Line. Only once have we ever truly considered crossing it.

A tired cliche takes on new life as a refreshing approach to selling chewing gum in this category breakthrough by Trident and J. Walter Thompson USA.

This was back a few years ago, in the days when Peggy Fleming was fronting for Trident sugar-free gum. When, for the 11,609th time, we heard her ask, in a most aggressively cheerful tone, while brandishing several packs of Trident in a fanned-out-playing-card way such as no packs of gum had ever been displayed in the whole history of confection, "Who wants gum?" we flew into a rage.

For an instant, we lost grip on reality. We heard voices, aggressively cheerful voices, that asked, "Who wants to run through Ted Bates Advertising, New York, randomly attacking bystanders with a sharpened ice skate?" And to those inner demons we replied: "I do! I do!"

Luckily, the feeling passed. And, just as luckily, it turns out lo these many years later, so did the Trident account—from Bates to J. Walter Thompson USA. In a category that hadn't produced interesting TV advertising since the Teaberry Shuffle, JWT is running a delightful 30-second spot called "Walk & Chew."

Yes, that's right, a TV commercial that uses as a point of departure one of the more tired cliches in the American idiom. A phrase so obvious, so hackneyed, so blunt that it's a wonder Wm. Wrigley Jr. Co.—king of insipid gum advertising—didn't trot it out years ago.

The spot opens with a nice-looking businessman striding confidently down some brick steps, quickly stuffing a stick of gum in his mouth. One stride later he falls down the steps.

"You may have noticed," says the voice-over, "that lately lots of people are having considerable trouble walking and chewing gum at the same time. [A lady shoves in the gum, trips and sends her groceries flying. Then our gum-chewing businessman glides back, ramming a parking meter with his chest.] Perhaps it's because of the great new taste of Trident. Peppier original. Fruitier fruit. [A lady jams her heel in a sidewalk grate.] Bubblier bubble. [Two kids pop bubbles and collapse to the ground]. The great new taste of Trident. Still good for your teeth, and now it tastes better than ever."

The last image is a guy stuffing in some Trident, glancing down at a T-shape metal thing sticking up from the pavement. He leaps to avoid it, successfully, but as he brushes against it, on comes a fountain that soaks him to the skin. Please note: There's not a beaming, smart Mom in sight.

On second thought, it's no mystery that Wrigley never exploited the walking-and-chewing idea. While tripping down the steps is hardly Oscar Wilde material, this spot does boast a touch of irony, self-deprecation and just the slightest bit of edge—making it ipso facto beyond the intellectual grasp of the Doublemint twins.

By convention, gum ads have been more sugar-coated than the gum itself, so painfully wholesome that even the act of placing gum in the mouth has been ludicrously sanitized. But none of that contorted delicacy here. Here they just shove the stuff in, and more power to them.

We here at ADREVIEW want to hand it to copywriter Bob Mitchell, to art director Kathy McMahon, to director Howard Deutsch and to the client, Warner-Lambert Co. And to them, also some advice: Should you ever get really angry—say, at Care Free—and violent, and right to the edge of the Keating Line, don't cross it. Just shove in a stick of Trident. It's hard to kill and chew gum at the same time. □

Lipton ad push

Fruit Slush—have been disappointing.

Mr. St. Clair wouldn't comment on the company's individual business lines.

Observers say Lipton Cup-A-Soup, one of the company's flagship products, has been hurt not only by a reduction in advertising but by the aggressiveness of ramen noodle marketers. Ramen noodle products offer more noodles than other soups.

Arbitron/SAMI figures showed the Cup-A-Soup line had 7.8% share of the $524.9 million dehydrated soup category for the 52 weeks ended Oct. 5. That was good enough for second, behind Lipton's instant soup mix's 18.4%, but represented an 18.8% decline from a year earlier. And the instant soup line lost 1.7%.

By contrast, Nissin Foods' Oodles of Noodles, a ramen brand, was up 17.3% in dollar volume this year.

A source at Campbell Soup Co. said ramen soups are "killing the category," making big gains at the expense of all competitors but particularly Lipton.

Campbell has fought back with Campbell Ramen Noodle soups, already in 33 markets and expanding to new markets; Lipton has no ramen entry.

In the face of the increased competition, Lipton's ad spending for dry soup has been "anemic," said another Campbell executive.

In measured media, Lipton spent $3.6 million last year for its Cup-A-Soup and Lite Cup-A-Soup lines, down 48.8% from 1988.

Measured spending for the first half of 1990 showed less than $1 million in support, though those figures don't take into account the prime fall/winter season for promoting soup.

Lintas:New York handles the soups.

Tea is another headache for Lipton. Price increases drove the tea bag market up 0.2% to $541.2 million for the 52 weeks ended Oct. 5, Arbitron/SAMI figures showed, but tonnage fell 3.2%. That gave the company a 50.4% share for the period, compared with 52.9% a year earlier.

As the market leader, Lipton has been particularly vulnerable to the move toward soft drinks, sparkling waters and alternative drinks at tea's expense, said Tom Pirko, president of Bevmark, a consultancy.

In addition, Lipton has been letting its tea advertising, also at Lintas, slide.

When Oriental Treasures tea was introduced in 1986, Lipton was spending $18.8 million annually on tea advertising. By 1989, the company had dropped its acclaimed "Little Old Ladies" TV campaign and spending had dropped to $4 million.

"If it were a Coke-Pepsi situation, [Lipton] would have had to draw their guns and blast away," Mr. Pirko said. "But Lipton has so thoroughly dominated the market that they don't think they have to do any advertising."

The result, he said, is a weakened overall market.

"The company is doing a real poor job of trying to convert Americans to tea drinking," Mr. Pirko said.

Lack of competition isn't the problem in fruit snacks.

Information Resources Inc.'s InfoScan service showed Lipton with a 41% share of the $277 million category last year, trailing General Mills' 46%.

But in the second quarter of this year, General Mills built its share to 55% of the $80.7 million market, while Lipton plummeted to 26%.

Lipton appears to be outmatched in advertising by General Mills, as that company

"If it were a Coke-Pepsi situation, [Lipton] would have had to draw their guns and blast away. But Lipton has so thoroughly dominated the market that they don't think they have to do any advertising. . . . The company is doing a real poor job of trying to convert Americans to tea drinking."

boosts spending to help lines including Thunder Jets, Garfield & Friends and the new Surf's Up!, all introduced in the past year.

General Mills' fruit snack spending was $7.4 million in the first half of 1990, compared with $6.3 million for the Lipton lines, LNA/Arbitron reported.

The competition also is outgunning Lipton in powder drink mixes, where General Foods USA's Kool-Aid dominates the category with a share in excess of 75%, compared with Wyler's line with 19%.

With only $2 million in measured media spending behind the product, Wyler's share has remained "flat to down in a growing market," said a source at competitor Kraft General Foods.

But, given Unilever's deep pockets and Lipton's renewed commitment to advertising, industry analysts say the company could breathe new life into these major product lines.

Les Pugh, industry analyst with Salomon Bros., attributed Lipton's problems to "external pressures and aggressive competition," and said Lipton "aims to recapture the spark" that marked the company's new-product efforts in years past. □

Long overdue

Advertising agencies are becoming more delinquent in paying their bills. As of September, agencies owed a record $102.8 million in overdue bills to magazines, according to the Media Credit Association, a trade group affiliated with Magazine Publishers of America. Late payments have been growing each month for the past 20 months, breaking all records since the association started keeping records in 1903.

TWA nears choice

NEW YORK—Trans World Airlines this week will choose Avrett, Free & Ginsberg or Biederman, Kelly & Shaffer for its $45 million domestic ad account. An agency for the airline's $20 million European ad account could also be named this week. TWA named Barry Blau & Partners, Fairfield, Conn., to handle direct marketing, estimated at $5 million. Blau had handled Trump Shuttle, but the account has been inactive for at least six months. Young & Rubicam resigned the entire TWA account for cost reasons (AA, Oct. 8).

Lever sets Europe study

BRUSSELS—Lever Europe, which spends $400 million a year on advertising for the company's detergent, soap and household cleaning brands in Europe, has appointed Amsterdam-based Scan International to study the role of its ad agency networks. Most of Lever Europe's brands are aligned with Lintas:Worldwide, J. Walter Thompson Co. and Ogilvy & Mather, and that isn't expected to change. Lever Europe was set up in January to handle marketing on a European brand basis. "This means Lever is in effect moving from a country-based operation to a brand-based one, and that means agencies will have to be adapted on that basis," said Hein Becht, a partner in Scan International.

$1.1M verdict in Chilko

By Scott Hume and Ira Teinowitz

A U.S. District Court jury on Friday found DDB Needham Worldwide partly to blame for a 1987 rafting accident on the Chilko River and ordered the agency to pay $1.1 million to the family of retired executive James Fasules, who drowned on the trip.

The verdict followed more than 3 hours of deliberations, and the jury determined Mr. Fasules himself was partly to blame.

Ron Thompson, the guide hired by then DDB Needham U.S. President Al Wolfe, testified earlier in the week that he had pulled Mr. Fasules to a safe position after the accident, suggesting Mr. Fasules had apparently left that position and drowned.

William Swindal, attorney for Needham, held out hope Judge Charles Kocoras might set aside or reduce the award.

The jury actually awarded $2 million in damages, reduced to $1.1 million after determining Mr. Fasules was 45% responsible. Illinois law, under which the damages were determined, would have barred any damages if Mr. Fasules had been at least 50% responsible.

The jury awarded $1.5 million (reduced to $825,000) for losses of services and society to Mr. Fasules' widow and $50,000 (reduced to $27,500) for each of Mr. Fasules' three children. Mr. Fasules' estate got $350,000 (reduced to $192,500) for "loss of goods, pain and suffering."

The family had asked for $5 million.

"God had nothing to do with this accident. Nature had nothing to do with this accident. This accident was caused by negligence."

In closing arguments, Brian Crowe, attorney for the Fasules family, said Mr. Wolfe never adequately warned Mr. Fasules about the dangers of whitewater rafting and "negligently exercised control" over the guide for that fateful Aug. 1, 1987, excursion. Five men died when the raft struck a rock, dumping into the river 11 of the 12 men on board.

"God had nothing to do with this accident. Nature had nothing to do with this accident," Mr. Crowe said. "This accident was caused by negligence."

Mr. Swindal, chief attorney for DDB Needham, countered in his closing arguments that Mr. Fasules "was a risk taker who was aware of the risks."

Mr. Swindal also told the jury to disregard as gross overstatements Mr. Crowe's attempts to characterize Mr. Wolfe as a "macho man" who led the trip "like Rambo going through the rainforests of Southeast Asia."

"When you peel away the hyperbole, the overreaching, Needham is not responsible" for the death of Mr. Fasules, Mr. Swindal said.

Before final arguments, jurors heard Mr. Wolfe testify for a second time. He said the trip "started with a business base."

But fishing and rafting trips are chances "for people working hectic schedules to get away from all the trappings [of the business world]," he said.

Mr. Wolfe said he invited Mr. Fasules after another invitee canceled.

"I told [Mr. Fasules] there would be at least 45 minutes of the wildest and wooliest

Price strategy used for Denver co-op aids $55M win

By Scott Hume

DDB Needham Worldwide last week recaptured a piece of McDonald's national account by following the strategy Leo Burnett USA used to win the account in 1981: Be patient, let McDonald's know what you can do and show your loyalty by not pursuing competitors' accounts.

DDB Needham, Chicago, won $55 million in national McDonald's Corp. business because the agency has shown, through its handling of local co-op accounts, what it could do to help the fast-food marketer's stagnant domestic sales. The business comes from Burnett, which keeps $245 million of the account.

Now that DDB Needham is in the national door, the agency can work on winning the remainder of the McDonald's account, the same method Burnett used.

McDonald's sources say work that DDB Needham's Denver office has done for the co-op there contributed to both the win and a shift in McDonald's marketing strategy.

Local ads in Denver are currently promoting a 59¢ "Any-time meal" discount program and a "59-second service guarantee" (any slower and customers get free fries). Those tactics are keeping customer counts above those in many other markets.

Following the agency announcement, McDonald's told franchisees that the company was initiating a new national "value strategy." The strategy is expected to include menu changes and deep price discounting.

McDonald's Chief Financial Officer Jack Greenberg was quoted on the Dow Jones news wire as saying the strategy could include selective price cuts. But he denied rumors of permanent, across-the-board menu slashing.

He also said the new strategy might include portion-size decreases that would allow for price reductions without hurting profits. For example, children's Chicken McNugget Happy Meal packs could include four rather than six nuggets, at a lower price.

Analysts expect McDonald's, which last year spent roughly $300 million in the U.S. through Burnett, to spend even more heavily in 1991 to build market share and customer traffic.

Car advertisers take bye on Super Bowl

High price, ad clutter turn off marketers

By John McManus

Automakers are turning from Super Bowl XXV in droves, though big-time ad battles between soft drinks, athletic shoes and Budweiser beers are expected.

Airlines, insurance companies and credit card marketers are also missing so far from the Jan. 27 ABC telecast.

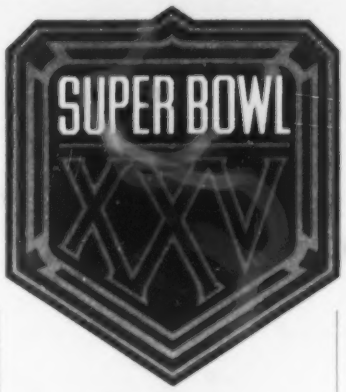
The $800,000 price tag for a 30-second commercial in a year without many new models is what's driving away U.S. and Japanese automakers.

"Sports is a bargain these days, and frankly you don't need to spend $800,000 to make a statement," said Annette Cerbone, VP-network programming in the New York office of Chiat/Day/Mojo, agency for Nissan Motor Corp USA.

"If you're only going to buy just one spot, we're starting to think it's a waste, because you get buried by the advertisers who are buying the multiple spots," she said.

By the end of last week, all but six of the 56 30-second units available had been sold out, ABC said. An undetermined number of additional units that cost dramatically less than $800,000 per :30 are available in pre-game and post-game shows.

Only two car companies had committed to buy airtime by late last week.



"Sports is a bargain these days. . . . you don't need to spend $800,000" per :30.

ABC said Volkswagen of America's Audi unit will run a :60 in the pre-game show and repeat the commercial during the game.

The network wouldn't identify the other automaker. Chrysler Corp., General Motors Corp.'s Pontiac Division, Toyota Motor Sales USA and Nissan advertised on Super Bowl XXIV last January.

"At this time last year, CBS was sold out of its game inventory but had much more available in its pre-game and post-game shows," said Jake Keever, exec VP-sales at ABC. "We've been able to protect our price of $800,000-plus and have done very well at packaging the pre- and post-game shows with our in-game inventory."

CBS sold out its commercial inventory for Super Bowl XXIV at a cost of $725,000 per :30. But in the game, the San Francisco 49ers blew out the Denver Broncos 55-10, resulting in a 39 Nielsen rating and a 63 share, making it the worst-rated Super Bowl in 20 years, though it still has been the year's most-watched program.

Audi will launch a major new campaign and theme line, said Bob Garity, manager-advertising for the importer. DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, is the agency.

Mr. Garity wouldn't disclose details but said the campaign will focus on "handling and control aspects" of Audi cars. Audi will follow up with a 12-page supplement in The Wall Street Journal later in the week.

Toyota, which bought three :30s last year, is skipping the event because it has nothing new to introduce and decided to divert money to other sports programming.

"We would rather be involved in something that gave us a little more continuity in our presence," said David Pelliccioni, Toyota's national advertising manager.

Nissan said it has no new vehi-

Analysts: WPP troubled

By Laurel Wentz

LONDON—U.K. analysts are worried WPP Group could be short of money to cover covenants in loan agreements after the first quarter of 1991 if the climate for the advertising industry keeps worsening.

Chief Executive Martin Sorrell is believed to be negotiating with his U.S. and U.K. banks, which could possibly pressure him to sell assets or seek an equity partner to raise cash if covenants, or agreements, are breached. WPP declined comment.

Analysts, however, say the banks would be more likely to make WPP pay higher interest rates if covenants on interest cover and working capital can't be met.

Interest cover is the number of times operating profits cover likely interest payments. Loan agreements generally have covenants specifying the interest cover to be maintained as well as limits on working capital to be drawn.

WPP is expected to undergo an even more stringent round of rebudgeting at its operating companies, including J. Walter Thompson Co. and Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide, as Mr. Sorrell struggles to produce better numbers.

Budget meetings are scheduled today in New York with JWT and next week in London with Ogilvy & Mather.

JWT here has already fired 10% of its staff, letting 40 people go last week. In the U.S., Scali, McCabe, Sloves last month laid off 35 to 40 staffers following the loss of the $40 million Volvo Cars of North America account.

One WPP agency executive said his shop expects to be asked to review costs again.

"The banks will extract their pound of flesh. If WPP breaks [their covenants], the banks will want higher interest rates. . . ."

WPP's share price tumbled after the company warned on Nov. 19 that 1990 pretax profits will be lower than expected due to the advertising downturn in the U.S. and U.K. Analysts quickly revised pretax profit forecasts down 18.5% to about $176 million.

Despite the profit revision and higher debt—the company has had to use more working capital than expected due to the general economic slowdown—WPP shouldn't have trouble meeting its covenants on interest cover and working capital this year.

"With the high level of uncertainty about next year's profits, there's a risk [WPP's] covenants could be breached in 1991," said David Forster, an analyst at U.K. stockbroker Kleinwort Benson. "If that happens, do the banks call in their loans? The answer is it's very unlikely. They'll probably renegotiate."

Mr. Forster said if WPP does breach its covenants, it would probably happen in March or April because cash flow is weakest at the end of the first quarter.

It's still unclear what concessions banks would expect if WPP defaults on its covenants.

"The banks will extract their pound of flesh," one analyst said. "If WPP breaks [their covenants], the banks will want higher interest rates [on WPP debt] and other things."

The "other things" could include cutting WPP's dividend, which is likely in any case, the analyst said.

If WPP's financial situation worsens, the banks could pressure the company to sell assets or seek a partner, financial experts say.

Seeking an equity partner would be unpopular with shareholders because it would dilute their stakes in the company. There's been speculation Mr. Sorrell has approached Dentsu; the Americans step into a new fitness market

Population ages, walking grows in stature and equipment makers run off to find new converts

By Adrienne Ward

AD AGE GALLUP SURVEY

More people are exercising on a daily basis now than ever before, an exclusive Adrertising Age/Gallup Organization survey shows.

But while exercise patterns are growing, consumers are not spending much money to keep fit.

A telephone survey of 1,000 adults shows the number of Americans that do some daily activity to keep physically fit is increasing, from 44% in 1985 to 67% this year.

Walking is the top choice for 54% of respondents, while 6% cite running, 10% cycling, 8% aerobics and 10% weight lifting. Other answers cited by respondents range from swimming and calisthenics to working in the garden and chasing after the kids.

"A lot more people are walking now because they realize heavy-duty exercises are tougher on their joints," says Emrika Padus, executive editor of Prevention, whose data also indicate a walking boom. "Research shows that walking is just as good for an aerobic workout as many other activities."

The problem for health and fitness marketers is that walking is relatively inexpensive. Beyond a good pair of shoes and some comfortable workout clothes, consumers do not need to invest a lot of money to keep up the activity.

When Gallup asked respondents how much they spend on fitness or athletic equipment a year—excluding club memberships—40% of respondents said they spend nothing; 24% spend less than $100; 19% spend $101 to $250; and 6% spend $250 to $400. At the high end, 3% spend $1,000 or more a year on equipment.

Cathy Calhoun, director of advertising and PR for Wilson Sporting Goods, says her company is not feeling pinched by the walking boom.

"If everyone was gardening and walking, we wouldn't be here," she says. "I'm happy to say people are also golfing and playing tennis."

Wilson's target audience is the serious tennis player and golfer who is willing to spend the money to get the best equipment available, Ms. Calhoun says, adding the company is introducing a new tennis racket that will retail for $300, which she says is higher than any other available racket.

Many fitness experts say there's greater growth potential beyond the hard-core fitness buffs but also warn marketers will have to work harder to reach them.

Thomas Doyle, director of information and research for National Sporting Goods Association, says one in five adults exercises at least once a week, two in five don't exercise at all and two in five feel they should exercise but don't.

"That's 40% of the adult population that's an untapped market," he says.

"The most common excuse these people give is they don't have enough time, but that's a lie," he says. "Couch potatoes deep down admit they haven't motivated themselves; they blame themselves. The trick for marketers is to find the button that gets them to overcome that barrier."

Mr. Doyle says workout machines with feedback mechanisms, otherwise known as "bells and gadgets," are beneficial because they give immediate responses that can help people stay with something they don't like to do.

He also believes higher prices help keep people motivated.

"From a psychological point of view it's useful. Just spending more [on a piece of exercise equipment for the home] is motivation to use it. People feel guilty if they don't," Mr. Doyle says. "There are far too many [less-expensive] exercise bicycles sitting in attics."

Gallup survey on U.S. health and fitness trends

The Gallup Organization surveyed 1,000 adults to find out where they stand on fitness. The results show 67% engage in some form of exercise on a daily basis, up from 44% five years ago. Walking is the No. 1 activity, followed by weight lifting, cycling, aerobics, running and playing ball. For more survey results, see Page 39.

Charles Kuntzleman, a fitness consultant and University of Michigan associate professor, says exercise marketers have generally focused on one market—young, upscale, white-collar consumers—and have ignored the rest of the market.

"We have to somehow learn how to turn the key on [the middle class]. That's where marketers have failed."

Mr. Kuntzleman also is critical of marketers who emphasize health in their ads.

"The majority of people are not motivated by health until they lose it. That's why seniors exercise—they experience a decline of sorts and so they start walking programs," he says.

ford to join these exclusive clubs doesn't aspire to be somebody else, says Darren Hodgdon, exec VP-marketing for Sporting Clubs of America, which owns 11 high-end clubs.

Marc Onigman, publisher of Club Industry, estimates 30 million Americans belong to health clubs, up from about 20 million five years ago. In the same time period, the number of health facilities has increased 20% to about 30,000 currently.

But the current figures are illusory because they don't include people who work out in corporate or residential health facilities or members of not-for-profit YMCAs and YWCAs, he says.

One way the industry has attempted to reach new audiences is to emphasize fitness as a stress reducer and general health enhancer, Mr. McCarthy says.

"The '90s appeal is on being your best in all parts of your life, so we'll see more and more clubs addressing stress, weight and other mature adult issues," he says.

However, some people want to be where the bodies are.

For them, Bally's Health & Tennis Corp. continues to tout its 311 U.S. clubs with well-sculpted celebrities. Sheena Easton, Don Johnson and Shari Belafonte are currently celebrity spokes-physiques.

Sports Club Co., with eight clubs in southern California, features stunning models in ads for its five Sports Connection facilities.

"L.A. is basically a body market," says Sports Club VP and cofounder Nanette Pattee Francini. "In other markets they can talk about the de-stressing and the cardiovascular equipment. Our people are into those things, but the main point is how they look." □

DMA to publish green handbook

By Alison Fahey

Direct mailers, and catalogers in particular, are getting green.

By the start of next year, the Direct Marketing Association will publish guidelines on how its members—major users of paper and ink products—can implement environmentally responsible practices.

This is the first result of the DMA's Task Force on Environmental Issues, formed last year to investigate ways direct marketers can be more environmentally conscious.

The booklet, called the "DMA Environmental Resource for Direct Marketers," urges the 3,600 member companies to "reduce, reuse and recycle." It encourages direct marketers to clean up mailing lists, establish in-house recycling programs, use recycled and/or recyclable paper and packaging, reduce paper waste and support the development of recycled paper markets.

"Initially, environmentalists were quick to single out direct mail as a target as being anti-environmental," said Chet Dalzell, the DMA's director of public relations. "However, a lot of the same groups have realized that they, too, rely heavily on direct mail, and instead of taking a confrontational approach, they are beginning to participate with us."

But the DMA acknowledges there are several obstacles for direct mailers. Switching to recycled paper stock may diminish the quality of photographs in catalogs, and there's a limited supply of recycled paper in the U.S.

Still, the obstacles haven't deterred direct mailers from experimenting with green programs.

Some marketers are printing portions of their catalogs on paper with recycled content, including Eddie Bauer Inc., L.L. Bean Inc. and Roberta Fortune's Almanac. Others, including Esprit de Corps, MacConnection, Patagonia and Seventh Generation have been able to print the entire catalog on paper with recycled content.

Other efforts under way include:

- L.L. Bean next spring will publish a specialty catalog printed on 50% recycled fiber. The cataloger is already shipping orders of certain sizes in recycled and reusable cartons. In addition, L.L. Bean last year formed "Outdoor Volunteer Opportunities," a program that encourages consumers to volunteer in the outdoors. The company promotes the program in its catalogs.
- Times Mirror Magazines, publisher of nine national magazines including Field & Stream and Golf Magazine, has formed an internal committee of editors and corporate staff to investigate using combinations of recycled paper for sections in the company's magazines.
- Esprit, an apparel cataloger, has been using recycled paper stock since early this year. The company's latest catalog urges consumers to "Live with the earth in mind."
- Williams-Sonoma, Pottery Barn, Hold Everything, Gardener's Den and Chamber's are encouraging their customers to reuse materials used for shipping and packaging. These catalogers have switched to a polystyrene plastic foam that doesn't harm the ozone layer.
- Roberta Fortune's Almanac, which stopped using polystyrene foam in packaging three years ago, recently donated catalog space to publish environmental tips for consumers. The company is also sending tree seed packets with each order. □

Ohio Lottery employs data-base marketing

By Ira Teinowitz

The Ohio Lottery is hoping it can boost sales by adopting data-base marketing.

In an apparent first for state lotteries, the Ohio Lottery is using direct mail couponing to put together not only a list of lottery players but demographic information about their playing habits.

Depending on how well the mailing works, players will be targeted for later direct marketing based on the data.

"We are trying to capture the names of our players," said Shel Green, exec VP of Integrated Target Marketing, Westlake, Ohio, which handles the effort.

Marcus Advertising, Cleveland, is the lottery's ad agency.

"We are one of the lotteries that is maturing, so we are preparing for the future," said Ron Nabakowski, lottery director, who added that the targeting will be especially helpful in luring higher-income players.

"We have started off in the position of being accused of regressive taxation [by appealing to poorer people]," he said. "We want to continue marketing aimed outside of blue-collar to offer entertainment and recreation to groups that don't traditionally do lotteries."

Several of the 33 states with lotteries have previously offered coupon discounts, and some have tried direct marketing programs, including Illinois. But none has built a demographic data base.

"Direct data bases is the wave of the future," said Eugene M. Christiansen, a gambling industry consultant at Christiansen, Cummings & Associates.

"The gambling industry, with the exception of some resorts, is woefully behind the rest of the economy because they don't have data bases," he said. "What the Ohio Lottery is doing is developing one."

In early November, the lottery mailed 300,000 pieces to state residents with one of three offers. Some were offered a buy-one-get-one-free coupon worth $1. Others were offered a free instant game with the purchase of a lottery ticket or a free lottery ticket with the purchase of two instant games.

The mailing also tested two creative packages.

All the coupons asked those using them to fill out a short questionnaire on the back. Among the questions: number of people in the household, the types of lottery games played and how often and favorite sports.

Mr. Green said the lottery hopes to be able to use the information for future targeting.

"We hope to be able to judge the results and to market new games and pick new subjects based on the results," he said. "We want to be smarter about who our customers are."

One immediate focus may be developing a list for a planned lottery subscription drive, though Mr. Green said he hopes to see the lottery go further. □

Ad Council enlists mailers

By Alison Fahey

The Advertising Council for the first time is enlisting the direct mail industry's help for its public service campaigns.

The Ad Council, the Direct Marketing Association and the U.S. Postal Service will team next year for a cooperative initiative called "Mail for Good Causes."

"There is an opportunity for enormous levels of frequency to augment what we get with other media," said Ruth Wooden, Ad Council president. "It can also help build reach for our messages."

The program initially calls for mailers to provide distribution channels for the Ad Council's work on behalf of non-profit causes and organizations. Later, the companies might be asked to donate paper and printing services, said Lisa Caugherty, director of the DMA's Shop-At-Home Information Center.

Many of the DMA's 3,600 member companies already promote non-profit causes independently. In the past, the Ad Council has worked with individual direct mail companies, such as Advo-System.

But the medium as a whole hasn't been a part of the Ad Council's media mix, which already includes all other major media.

"Direct mail is the last large medium to uncover. It had not been aggressively pursued" by the Ad Council or the direct mail industry.

"Direct mail is the last large medium to uncover," Ms. Wooden said. "It had not been aggressively pursued by us or by" the direct mail industry.

She added the Ad Council has been contacted by about 50 direct mail companies that are interested in participating in the program.

The program will start next spring with Spiegel. The cataloger plans to insert a message in merchandise shipped to customers.

Different strategies will be tested with different mailers. In addition to inserts in merchandise, another possibility would be bill stuffers.

The Ad Council doesn't know yet how many pieces of direct mail will be involved, Ms. Wooden said, but "if 'Mail for Good Causes' is a part of even a small percentage of this country's direct mail, we can deliver important messages to millions more Americans."

In 1989, direct mailers distributed 62.8 billion pieces of third-class mail, the DMA said.

Young & Rubicam's Wunderman Worldwide direct response unit, New York, is the volunteer agency of record for "Mail for Good Causes."

Wunderman is designing the logo and will work with the Ad Council's other agencies to adapt ad messages to direct mail. □

Madge, Whipple dip and squeeze in new A&W ads

By Patricia Winters

Instead of pushing toilet tissue and dishwashing liquid, Mr. Whipple and Madge the manicurist are turning their talents to A&W root beer and cream soda.

A&W Brands will try to break through the soft-drink clutter next month with a new campaign that features personalities from other TV commercials.

The marketer is hoping to stretch its media dollars by using personalities who are instantly recognizable and already established.

"We're taking other people's ad dollars and using it to work for us," said Phil Silvestri, exec VP-creative director at agency Della Femina, McNamee, New York.

Not all of the characters will be from TV commercials—Mr. T of the former NBC-TV series "The A-Team" will appear in one spot.

Madge the manicurist keeps dipping her fingers in an A&W soft drink in a new spot breaking next month.

Mr. Silvestri said the people selected are famous for a "certain schtick" and an earthiness that reflects A&W's brand personality.

The first of six 30-second spots breaks Jan. 18. They will run on network and spot TV. All the spots show the filming of a commercial on a closed set and open with a shot of a table with an A&W product, with the voice of a director instructing

Hearst, Dow Jones plan business title

Joint project to test ad climate in 1991

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—Hearst Corp. and Dow Jones & Co., publisher of The Wall Street Journal, are jointly developing a monthly business title to be tested in mid-to-late 1991.

The as-yet-untitled magazine will be published as a stand-alone and is expected to compete with every-other-weeklies Forbes and Fortune.

"We are exploring it," said John Mack Carter, editor in chief of Good Housekeeping and director of magazine development at Hearst Magazines. "We have an agreement to explore this in 1991 and see what kind of magazine we want to produce."

Mr. Carter said the project combines Hearst's magazine development and publishing know-how with Dow Jones' business information expertise.

Hearst approached Dow Jones several times in recent years about exploring such a project, he said, but was told "the time wasn't right."

Peter R. Kann, president-chief operating officer of Dow Jones and publisher of the Journal, finally decided to take Hearst up on its offer in October.

His decision came shortly after he was named to take Dow Jones' ceo post on Jan. 1. Just before the announcement, Mr. Kann had co-authored a cost-cutting memo stating that a magazine project being developed by Dow Jones would be tabled because of a "deteriorating economic climate" (AA, Oct. 22).

"We do have an agreement [with Hearst], basically to explore whether a magazine makes sense," said Roger May, director of corporate relations for Dow Jones. "We describe it as a pilot project that could lead to a joint venture. It may or may not."

Messrs. May and Carter said it was premature to discuss the content of the planned magazine.

Mobil's RICO victory bolsters ad industry

By Steven W. Colford

A federal judge in Philadelphia has struck a potentially serious blow against false advertising suits filed under the Racketeer Influenced & Corrupt Organization Act.

U.S. District Judge Charles Weiner last week dismissed a RICO false advertising suit against Mobil Corp., rejecting two key arguments that had formed the basis for several similar, earlier suits under that 1970 law.

At issue in the Mobil case was the package labeling, advertising and promotion of Hefty trash bags as "degradable" that appeared from mid-1989 until early this year.

The plaintiffs in the class action suit, filed on behalf of consumers, claimed they were harmed because Mobil used sales proceeds from Hefty bags to continue what they alleged was a fraudulent marketing campaign.

They also argued the relationship between Mobil and its ad agency—Wells, Rich, Greene, New York—satisfied another requirement of RICO. That criterion makes it unlawful for "any person employed or associated with any enterprise" affecting interstate commerce to participate in the enterprise's affairs through a pattern of racketeering activity.

"It's overly optimistic to say it's the end of RICO [in advertising cases], but this ruling might put an end to the recent spate of cases."

Judge Weiner rejected both arguments. He said putting money derived from Hefty sales back into the ad campaign didn't satisfy the RICO statute.

The RICO criterion on reinvestment would have been satisfied only if Mobil invested the Hefty proceeds in an entirely different business, said John Williams, lead attorney for Mobil.

"RICO was enacted to prevent organized crime from taking illegal money and putting it into a legal enterprise," Mr. Williams said. "Because the plaintiffs here couldn't point to racketeering money that had been invested, they said the proceeds from the ad campaign and sales were reinvested in the campaign. They thought that satisfied the law, but Judge Weiner said no way."

The judge also ruled the relationship between Mobil and WRG didn't satisfy RICO's intended definition of an enterprise.

"This part of RICO was intended to prevent the taking of control of an innocent enterprise by racketeers," Mr. Williams said. "If that is the case, it makes no sense for that enterprise that's taken over to be the defendant or its agent."

He said the ruling was a significant turn against the proliferation of false-advertising cases under the RICO statute.

"It's overly optimistic to say it's the end of RICO [in advertising

WPP, Saatchi woes hitting U.S. units

By Gary Levin and Laurel Wentz

NEW YORK—Troubles plaguing two major U.K.-based agency groups are landing on U.S. shores, with agencies here facing intense pressure to cut costs in 1991.

The combination of high debt and a weaker dollar are making more layoffs—already commonplace among many agencies—even more likely at shops owned by WPP Group and Saatchi & Saatchi Co.

Account losses and reviews are making the situation even more tense.

WPP's Ogilvy & Mather unit last week learned Hardee's Food Systems had put its $50 million account up for review after six years at the agency (see story on Page 3).

NutraSweet Co.'s $40 million account at O&M's Chicago office also is up for grabs, with a decision coming soon.

WPP's J. Walter Thompson USA—which ironically is pitching NutraSweet—has account troubles as well.

JWT dumped the media buying portion of Bally's Health & Tennis Corp.'s $60 million account, leading to the dismissal last week of 40 staffers, or one-third of the employees of the agency's Los Angeles office.

Earlier this year the office lost its largest client, 20th Century Fox Film Corp., so it ends the year with $100 million in billings—just half the size of last year.

William Lane, exec VP of the office, said Bally's had "charged up to the limit" and the agency was acting to protect the "fiduciary interest" of parent WPP. Earlier in the year, WPP Chief Executive Martin Sorrell took JWT's New York office out of the running for Continental Airlines' $40 million to $50 million account, citing the carrier's financial woes.

JWT's Toronto office also faces the possible loss of Pepsi-Cola Canada, a $21 million account being sought by Baker Lovick, owned by lead Pepsi agency BBDO Worldwide (see story on Page 22).

John Hall/Holly Segure

The U.S. Marine Corps is in the midst of a mandatory review of its $16 million account. The incumbent, JWT's Atlanta office, last week lost the Snapper Power Equipment account, with measured media spending of $14 million last year, to West & Co., Atlanta.

Scali, McCabe, Sloves, the troubled New York agency negotiating to buy itself back from WPP, has lost more than $100 million in business this year, including the embarrassing forced resignation of the $40 million Volvo Cars of North America account. Remaining billings for the New York office are about $200 million.

JWT's Detroit office last week laid off six staff members, effective the end of the month, and won't replace five employees who are retiring at the same time, leaving 453 office employees and field staff who report to it.

"Martin [Sorrell] is turning his agencies over to the financial people and asking for extraordinary measures," said an executive at

'National' cuts rate base

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—The National has fallen short of its circulation guarantees since its January launch and is preparing to offer make-goods to advertisers, the newspaper's executives said last week.

In the wake of a recent management shake-up, the sports daily also will lower its rate base and advertising rates.

The National has been guaranteeing advertisers a rate base of 275,000, but got about 73% of that with an average of just under 200,000 copies per day in October, acknowledged Advertising Sales Director Pete Spina.

He said the paper has missed its rate base by an average of about 30% since it was launched Jan. 31 in New York, Los Angeles and Chicago with a rate base of 250,000.

Mr. Spina last week called on major ad agencies to inform them of the circulation shortfall and explain the steps being taken to correct the problem.

The rate base will be lowered 27.3% to 200,000 immediately, although the paper is likely to deliver a bonus as it expands into new markets. The rate for a color page will be reduced 31% to $8,000.

Plans call for the paper's rate base to rise to 225,000 on Feb. 1 with the color page rate going to $8,500, Mr. Spina said. On July 1, the rate base will reach 250,000 and the cost of a color page will increase to $9,000.

The National also applied for membership with Audit Bureau of Circulations.

"We weren't ever trying to hide anything," Mr. Spina said. "We were in the blind for the first 10 months. We were led to believe we were delivering certain numbers."

Mr. Spina indicated the discovery of the gap between rate base and actual sales prompted the shake-up last month in which Pete Price, the paper's president and publisher gave up day-to-day control of the publication.

"We weren't ever trying to hide anything. . . . We were led to believe we were delivering certain numbers."

The newspaper's circulation director, assistant publisher and finance/administration director were dismissed then.

The sweeping changes were ordered by the paper's majority owner, Mexican media mogul Emilio Azcarraga Milmo. Jaime Davila, a group VP at Mr. Azcarraga's Univisa TV network, was brought here from Los Angeles to oversee the changes.

The paper's executives said Mr. Azcarraga is committed to working out problems and has no plans to sell or fold The National. "He is not a man who cuts and runs," said Editor-in-Chief Frank Deford.

The National expects to be in 13 or 14 markets by July. A Washington/Baltimore edition, the 10th, was launched last week. On tap are Philadelphia, Denver, Seattle/Tacoma, Wash., and, possibly, Atlanta.

Mr. Spina said several promotion and circulation efforts are being considered, including possibly advertising or distributing issues through sports arenas. A home delivery plan is also being developed.

The National expects to name a new ad agency within a month, Mr. Spina said. Wieden & Kennedy, Portland, Ore., agency for Nike, The National's largest advertiser, is among a handful of candidates.

Serino Coyne Inc., New York, was dismissed shortly after Mr. Davila took the reins.

Agency media buyers said they were relieved National executives were coming forward with the truth. There had been persistent rumors in recent months that the paper wasn't meeting its rate base.

"I'm not surprised. What disturbed me was there was deception involved and that's too bad," said Gary Pranzo, exec VP-media director, Young & Rubicam. "We will have to sit down and figure out what we think is proper compensation."

But, he said, "It doesn't loosen my faith in the paper itself. It's still as good an editorial product as they proposed."

Paul [illegible], VP-director of print [illegible] Advertising, said he [illegible] paper "came clean. It was a positive reversal and a commitment to the future." ☐

Degree makes leaders sweat

By Pat Sloan and Laurie Freeman

Toiletries experts are predicting a major showdown in 1991 between leaders of the antiperspirant/deodorant market and two young upstarts—Helene Curtis Industries' Degree and Unilever's Powerstick.

Degree, a unisex line that's based on body-heat activation technology, was introduced late last year and now commands 5.5% of the $1.2 billion market. Powerstick, introduced about the same time, has a 3% share.

Procter & Gamble Co. and Mennen Co. are believed to be planning retaliatory measures to defend their positions.

One industry analyst said P&G is working on a technological advance for its Sure unisex antiperspirants. Meanwhile, Mennen is gearing up for a fight in the men's segment, where Powerstick is positioned.

"Next year, [Mennen is] going to ... be aggressive in terms of both product and spending," said John Dooner, president of McCann-Erickson North America. "There's no question that with Unilever involved and P&G—in a larger way with the acquisition of Old Spice—there's greater competition."

McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, handles Mennen.

P&G this year bought the Old Spice brand from American Cyanamid Co.

Analysts say most of Degree's success came at the expense of P&G's Secret and Sure, whose shares fell to 12.6% and 11.8%, respectively, through the first nine months of this year, from 14% and 12.5% for all of 1989.

Also feeling Degree's sting is Gillette Co.'s Dry Idea, which dropped to 4.3% through September from 5.5% for 1989, said Jay Freedman, senior VP at Kidder, Peabody & Co., and Carter-Wallace's Arrid, slipping to 9.5% in '90 through September from 10.5% for 1989.

Analysts credit Powerstick with knocking Mennen deodorant down to a 15% share through September from 16.5% in all of 1989, and Gillette's Right Guard down to 7% from 7.6%.

Despite Degree's success, industry marketing executives say the real contest could be between P&G and Unilever. The two are already gearing up for a fight between Old Spice and Unilever's Brut in the men's deodorant segment.

"They [Unilever] are the leaders worldwide with an 18% share compared to P&G's 10% share," said one marketer who asked not to be identified. "In the U.S., of course, it's the reverse.

"Unilever has wanted to get into the U.S. for years and now with Powerstick they feel they're a player," he said.

P&G's brands in the U.S. combine for a 29% share.

One source familiar with both companies noted that the antiperspirant/deodorant market, with only 4% dollar growth and 1% unit growth this year, is essentially flat. And that's where the problem lies for the smaller companies.

"Yes, it's stagnant and it's a battle for market share," said the executive. "But there's an area of opportunity.

"This isn't a category based on dreams in a bottle. It's a technically and functionally clean category, all of which means you have to spend money on advertising and also invest in technology. Unilever's in a position to do that, and P&G is. But how can a $700 million company do both? There's a competitive vulnerability."

McCann's Mr. Dooner sees it differently and suggested that some rivals to his client, Mennen, will have to pull back on spending.

"The fact is that the investment spending level of a couple of the new stick entries really suggests an impossibility in terms of a payout," he said.

But Helene Curtis VP Peter Wentz said his company plans to keep 1991 advertising and promotional spending for Degree at this year's level of about $50 million, via Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York.

Close to $20 million of that goes into measured media.

Curtis is also preparing new Degree products, he said. And in January, Curtis will introduce a reformulated and repackaged Suave antiperspirant/deodorant backed by a 20% increase in ad spending, Mr. Wentz said.

The company will spend an estimated $8 million this year on Suave via Bayer Bess Vanderwarker, Chicago.

Mennen spent $16.7 million through August in measured media for its Mennen brand, while Unilever spent $7.4 million on Powerstick, via Lintas:New York, reported LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service. Gillette put $7.1 million behind its Right Guard line, via BBDO Worldwide; P&G supported Secret with $17.5 million, via Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, and Sure with $8.8 million, via Grey Advertising, New York. □

New 'Daily News' salvo

Strikebound paper unveils afternoon edition

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—The Daily News began publishing an afternoon edition last week in a bid to halt strike-induced circulation and advertising declines.

Media analysts viewed the launch of the "PM Edition" as an offensive move by the tabloid's management and a sign that its parent, Tribune Co., isn't ready to give up the fight.

Ad linage and circulation declines since the strike began Oct. 25 threaten to force the company to close the 71-year-old paper.

Union leaders derided the afternoon edition as a publicity stunt and a "joke" destined to meet the same fate as the paper's "Daily News Tonight" edition, which folded in 1981 less than a year after its launch.

"Generally, what has happened in recent days makes it increasingly clear that Tribune is not ready to walk away from this thing," said Kevin Gruneich, a media analyst at First Boston Corp. "I think in the coming days we're going to see renewed vigor by the Daily News management and Tribune Co."

He said the "PM Edition" will increase the paper's losses and is likely to further strain management's relations with the unions.

The company's board is scheduled to meet Dec. 11 to decide whether to continue to support the Daily News.

Initial pressrun for the "PM Edition," being sold primarily by hawkers and newsstands in high-traffic commuter locations, is 30,000 copies. The Monday through Friday edition also includes the News' first use of spot color in the form of a blue band on the front and back covers.

The new afternoon edition of the Daily News is an indication of Tribune Co.'s willingness to fight it out, analysts say.

None of the city's other major dailies currently has an afternoon edition.

Mr. Gruneich said if the "PM Edition" leads to increased circulation, the tabloid may be able to woo back some of the major advertisers that have pulled out in recent weeks, including R.H. Macy & Co., Abraham & Straus and Alexander's (AA, Nov. 5, et seq.).

Most of those advertisers discontinued their ad schedules because of the News' distribution problems. None could be reached for comment last week.

Advertisers in the tabloid's regular morning edition are being offered the same amount of space in the new edition free. The first issue of the "PM Edition" included a handful of ads from small retailers such as Walton Mirror Works and New York Baby.

John Sloan, VP-human resources for the Daily News, said the paper had studied the launch of an afternoon edition for homeward bound commuters in recent months but that union contracts made the cost of producing such an edition "prohibitive" before the strike.

"After six months of extensive market research, it was determined that there was a need in the marketplace for late-breaking news and sports and business," he said. "We are able to do this now because we have eliminated the production and distribution restrictions and work rules that added unneccesary costs."

"It's a joke and a charade," said Deborah Friedman, a spokeswoman for the Allied Printing Trades Council, the umbrella group that includes the paper's nine striking unions. "They're just wasting more of their stockholders' money."

The News' current daily circulation is about 508,000, Mr. Sloan said, compared with 1.1 million before the strike. Union leaders say the actual circulation is between 200,000 and 300,000. □

Coppertone Sport hopes to shine

By Pat Sloan

Winter's barely begun, but Schering-Plough HealthCare Products is already thinking about summer.

The marketer is hoping to establish a new niche in the $500 million suncare category when it introduces Coppertone Sport in May.

The product, aimed at tennis players, golfers and other sports enthusiasts, is absorbed instantly into the skin to prevent it from running into the eyes or leaving a greasy residue on hands.

Schering-Plough has filed for a process patent on the product, which by reformulating existing ingredients offers "non-migrating, sweat-resistant protection" that leaves no residue, a company spokesman said.

While Coppertone Sport carries the Coppertone brand name, the product will have a separate identity created through a package design.

Coppertone Sport will be supported by a network TV and print campaign from Della Femina, McNamee, New York, and is targeted at adults ages 18 to 49.

Ideas for three commercials are now under consideration, but the campaign hasn't been finalized yet, said Mark Jones, senior account exec at the agency.

The Schering-Plough spokesman said there are no plans to use sports celebrities in advertising.

The spokesman declined to reveal the ad budget, but industry sources say they expect the launch to be supported by as much as $5 million, a large amount for the category.

Schering-Plough now spends about $6 million annually in total Coppertone advertising.

In the $328 million mass-market end of the category, Schering-Plough dominates with a 35% share through its three brands—Coppertone, Tropical Blend and Shade.

The company doesn't expect the new product to cannibalize existing Coppertone sales. While Coppertone Sport carries the Coppertone brand name, the product will have a separate identity created through a package design that represents a marked departure from traditional Coppertone packaging.

A royal blue hard-plastic tube with the dispenser on the bottom of the container instead of the top is accented by a geometric sports figure in shades of red, green and yellow. □

Commercial-free PPV an Olympian effort

NBC goes all-out to make Games' format work

By Laurie Freeman

NBC's hopes for its "Olympics Triplecast" pay-per-view package are set as high as the bar in the pole vault's gold-medal round.

Network executives foresee up to 3 million viewers and numerous promotional tie-ins for its PPV coverage of the 1992 Summer Olympics from Barcelona, Spain. But whether the network can clear the bar remains to be seen.

"I seriously question how they're going to get that level of homes to sign up for the package," says Stephen Grubbs, senior VP-national TV buying at BBDO Worldwide, New York.

Audience level is the primary issue, agrees Kay Durkin, VP-director of network broadcasts, Ogilvy & Mather, Chicago. "NBC's Olympics certainly will raise the visibility of PPV, but it's not clear . . . whether that will translate into subscribers," she says.

Viewers will shell out $149.95 for the PPV "Triplecast": 600 hours of live and taped events shown concurrently on three cable channels. The coverage is aimed at "complementing, not competing" with NBC's 160 hours of free Olympic programming, says Tom Rogers, president, NBC Cable & New Business.

Although NBC will not air commercials during its PPV coverage, the network is planning a number of promotional opportunities, which have piqued the interest of at least one advertiser already committed to over-the-air coverage.

Reebok International has signed a $10 million deal to advertise during NBC's regular coverage. The company now eagerly awaits the PPV presentation, scheduled to take place early this month, to find out how it can "enhance" its commercial presence.

"One of the things we're open to is [making] our presence bigger than just the NBC media buy, a way to take it all the way to bright," says Sharon Cohen, Reebok VP-advertising.

"We're planning everything short of rolling a commercial," says Marty Lafferty, NBC's VP-Olympics PPV.

NBC hopes to go beyond the traditional boards and anchor desk signage associated with PPV, offering top sponsors promotions, sweepstakes and sampling opportunities to "augment the reach and frequency of their Olympics associations," Mr. Lafferty says.

This means NBC would like the shoe sponsor to cross-coupon, perhaps sending a $25 to $50 coupon to subscribers, good both for that amount off a pair of shoes and for a discount on the PPV package.

To convince advertisers, however, NBC must first woo viewers. Most media buyers consider PPV a medium in its infancy.

About 14 million U.S. households currently have PPV capability. NBC projects 22 million households will have installed PPV by 1992.

"It's not unreasonable to expect at least 2.5 million to 3 million" to sign up for the Olympics, Mr. Lafferty says.

NBC is working with six agencies on a $40 million PPV multimedia campaign: D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York; DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago; N W Ayer, New York; Della Femina, McNamee; Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising's marketing services unit; and Communications Diversified.

Still, skepticism runs high as to whether NBC can attract 3 million sports addicts and still offer promotions that add value to an already sizable Olympics media bill.

Mr. Grubbs will "take a hard look" at NBC's proposals and guarantees before he even thinks about taking the idea to BBDO clients, which include past Olympics advertisers Federal Express Corp. and Lever Bros.

Another client, Pepsi-Cola Co., may get the PPV pitch if Coca-Cola Co. doesn't bite.

The Olympics may prove a positive experiment in broadening PPV programming, but media buyers doubt it will be the turning factor in proving PPV a viable medium.

"No one single event will make or break [PPV]," says Mr. Grubbs, particularly when the majority of the Games will be shown over "free" TV, he adds.

There's no question the audience is desirable, Ms. Durkin says.

"Anyone paying that amount of money to watch . . . certainly would create an environment we'd want to be in," she says. □

PEOPLE TO WATCH

Ray Joslin finds it easy to make friends in high places these days.

Big dealmakers in cable programming have found the soft-spoken 25-year cable veteran a good man to know: He calls the shots at Hearst Corp. as the publishing and TV giant focuses on cable acquisitions.

The man who pulled the trigger on Hearst's two blockbuster cable TV deals in October has been courted by just about every money-strapped cable network under the sun.

"We're not a bottomless pit," says Mr. Joslin, 54, corporate VP and head of Hearst's entertainment and syndication group. "But we've got the machinery in place to do due diligence on everything . . . we're interested in."

Mr. Joslin's visibility soared as Hearst has ponied up $200 million to become a major cable power as many media companies are cutting back for survival.

Hearst's biggest score was the more than $175 million acquisition of RJR Nabisco's 20% stake in ESPN.

Now Hearst has a major interest in three national cable networks: ESPN, 80% owned by Capital Cities/ABC; Arts & Entertainment, in partnership with Cap Cities/ABC and NBC; and Lifetime, with Cap Cities/ABC and Viacom.

Ray Joslin

Hearst also announced that its owned-and-operated WCVB-TV in Boston would join Boston-based Continental Cablevision in the $10 million start-up of a regional cable channel, New England Cable News Network.

In 1966 Mr. Joslin helped form Continental, now the nation's No. 3 multiple systems operator, while he was president of Joslin Communications. He became Continental's VP and stayed for 13 years.

He joined Hearst in 1980 as a VP and head of the company's cable communications group. In 1989 Hearst formed its entertainment and syndication group and placed Mr. Joslin in charge.

Media properties may have lost a great deal of Wall Street luster recently, but Mr. Joslin says Hearst's cable acquisition binge is far from finished.

"There are 25 established cable networks, and as the newcomers are finding out, it's a very difficult time to start from scratch," he says.

Mr. Joslin may shy away from some start-ups, but he is keeping his eye on the cutting edge.

"We have talked with all the players, and we'll keep talking to them. We've got two people on staff who do nothing but look into new TV ventures, including opportunities in direct broadcasting and international TV." □

Wacky cable shows develop a following

By Alicia Lasek

Cable's public access channels may have brought viewers thoughtful documentaries and heated local political debates. But it's the unlikely and strange that people most associate with public access. Advertising Age spanned the states to find proof of public access in its truest —and most fascinating—form.

"Clintonville Confidential"

For the last five years, James Wagner has documented his daily life on Columbus, Ohio's, public access Channel 21.

A producer and director at Columbus' government cable access channel, he has been known to hand his camcorder to his son and let the child film him ironing and doing dishes.

The show has generated a cult following and its share of complaints ("the camera was focused on his cat for a half-hour"), says Suzanne Patzer, programming director of Columbus Community Cable Access.

"Artistic Cosmetic Dentistry"

In Manhattan, dentist Barry Bloom hosts a one-hour call-in show he describes as "dull and devastating."

Devastating, he explains, tongue-in-cheek, because any dental encounter is traumatic for the public.

"I guess you could say it's infotainment," he adds.

"I talk about everything within the realm of dentistry," he says. "You can't leave anything out, because a healthy mouth is a beautiful mouth."

"Bernice Perry"

New Yorkers also get the retired Ms. Perry, who hosts a weekly tribute to Frank Sinatra.

Ms. Perry plays Mr. Sinatra's recordings, discusses his touring schedule and visits with guests that include other Frankie fans, stand-ins for his shows—anyone who has had contact with Mr. Sinatra in some way.

"Larz From Mars"

"Some people go bowling Wednesday nights; I go to Channel 10 and tape my show," says Fairfax, Va., taxi driver Larry Locoma.

Mr. Locoma hosts a laid-back talk show he describes as "a show to motivate people not to watch TV, to get them interested in what other people are doing." Segments include interviews with local entertainers and people with odd jobs.

"Once we had on a snake venom researcher from the National Institute of Health. We've interviewed car salesmen," he says.

"Face Your Pet"

Animal lover Kevin Roberts produces one of the most popular call-in shows on Austin, Texas, public access TV.

His pit bull terrier, Face, is the show's designated host. In addition to fulfilling society's right to meet the pets of local personalities, Mr. Roberts chats with owners of unusual animals and invites viewers to call in with questions—for the owners.

Mr. Roberts also discusses veterinary advice and continues an ongoing campaign to eliminate discrimination against pit bulls.

"Rob and Bill's Talk Show"

In South Carolina, self-described hang-out kings Rob Blackman and Bill Guandolo host what a local cable access spokeswoman calls a "kamikaze interview show."

The two invade kitchens to videotape frightening food for their "Bachelor Refrigerator of the Week" segment and read viewers' fortune cookie futures on location in Chinese restaurants.

The show also takes them into what Mr. Blackman terms "pseudo-controversial" territory, such as the landfill where the two searched for evidence of CIA payments to Gen. Manuel Noriega.

"We're what happens when you put a video camera in the hands of the common man," Mr. Guandolo adds. □

Ratings newcomer tests new meter

By David Kilburn

TOKYO—A newcomer to TV audience measurement is challenging Video Research and A.C. Nielsen Co. of Japan with a technologically advanced type of people-meter system.

Nippon Datacom Corp., whose doors opened Nov. 1, has developed a system based on technology originally created for fish-finding equipment.

Funding for the new V-line system is from Mitsui Engineering & Shipbuilding Co., Data-Access, NTT Data Communications and Kaijo Denko K.K.

The system's equipment includes a box on top of the TV, a scanning unit next to the TV and a remote control unit with a button to identify each family member.

If viewers forget to push their button, the scanning unit records a discrepancy and a warning light flashes on top of the box to remind the unidentified person to punch in.

Data go directly over telephone lines to a host computer, which compiles them into report form.

Then, data go directly from the V-line's host computer into subscribers' own computer systems.

Accuracy for the V-line system, launched last month is 95%, Nippon Datacom says. The system can record individual ratings every 5 seconds, while Video Research's and Nielsen's systems record household ratings every minute. The difference could be crucial, since 15-second spots are the most commonly used in Japan.

"Japanese advertisers have been hoping for such a system. It's the right time for the hardware."

Both Video Research and Nielsen use on-line recording systems that count programs as viewed as long as the TV set is on. The systems are backed up with diaries.

Both Nielsen and Video Research are developing "passive meters" that will use cameras to record who's watching TV without viewers having to take any action.

These are expected to be ready within two years.

A representative from the Japan Advertisers Association praised the Nippon Datacom system.

"Japanese advertisers have been hoping for such a system. It's the right time for the hardware," said Toshiyuki Mori, who heads the association's broadcast media committee.

Under the other two systems, "nobody knows if only a cat is sitting in front of the television set that is on and counted under the system," he said.

Nippon Datacom installed machines on a trial basis last month in 10 Tokyo homes. The number of participating homes will increase to 500 in greater Tokyo by July. Nippon Datacom targets 9,500 households within a few years, including 3,200 in the Tokyo area.

By comparison, Video Research has 2,000 sample homes, with 300 in the Tokyo area, and Nielsen has about 800 sample homes, 300 of them in the Tokyo area.

Nippon Datacom will start seeking subscribers for the system next spring after the trial run. Pricing for information hasn't been determined. □

Banking ad ban relaxed

But industry-wide campaign killed after bank scandal

By David Kilburn

TOKYO—Japan's banking federation has halted a planned TV campaign because of a scandal at Japan's most profitable bank.

Individual banks, however, are launching their own campaigns next month, as a voluntary ban ends.

The Federation of Bankers Associations had planned to launch this fall a $7.8 million campaign through Dentsu aimed at upgrading the image of member banks.

Workers in Japan this month get bonuses of up to 25% of their annual salaries, and the campaign was slated to encourage people to deposit this money.

Taizo Hashida, chairman of the federation and president of Fuji Bank, said the campaign was canceled because of mounting public criticism of the industry in the wake of problems at the Sumitomo Bank.

Two branch managers have been indicted for making illegal loans to land and stock speculators, forcing the bank chairman's resignation. Separately, executives of the Mitsui Trust & Banking Co. were arrested Oct. 24 on tax evasion charges linked to alleged dealings with real estate speculators.

Real estate speculation by banks is being blamed for making home ownership unaffordable for many Japanese. Revelations that banks have boosted their profits by loaning depositors' money to fuel rising prices have attracted widespread criticism.

Agency sources estimate that the 12 major city banks will each spend $7.8 million to $15.6 million annually on TV advertising.

Meanwhile, individual banks are preparing for the end of a 46-year-old self-regulatory code that prevented them from airing TV spots—including cable TV, satellite TV and videotex services.

The ban was created to avoid giving large banks an unfair advantage over smaller ones.

The code allowed only generic commercials sponsored by groups such as the banking federation. For example, last year, the group ran ads themed "Liberalization of financial services and how banks are changing in response to the needs of the times," a Dentsu spokesman said.

Lifting the ban could mean TV ad spending of more than $300 million annually, Dentsu said.

Agency sources estimate that the 12 major city banks—those with national branch networks that provide retail and business banking services—will each spend $7.8 million to $15.6 million annually on TV advertising.

However, small and midsize financial institutions believe they will be at a disadvantage since most will be unable to afford TV time, sources say.

The federation will allow each member bank to run up to 375 seconds of TV commercials each month, to a maximum of 2,700 seconds a year. □

Model cuts conversion confusion

By Betsy Spethmann

Marketing research has turned to religion for its latest measurement system.

Research companies in at least five countries have introduced the Conversion Model, a system that helps marketers identify consumers most likely to try a certain brand and suggests strategies for appealing to those consumers.

The system borrows the principles of the study of religious conversion, where scholars categorized individuals by their willingness to convert. Jan Hofmeyr, a consultant to Research Surveys, teamed the conversion logic with mathematical models to develop the system.

"We determine how close consumers are to the cliff of change" from one brand to another, said John "Butch" Rice, principal of Research Surveys Ltd., which is marketing the model in Australia and South Africa. Market Facts, Chicago, markets it in the U.S.

A questionnaire measures consumers' involvement in a category, their satisfaction with their current brand, their view of alternative products, and their level of ambivalence about the category.

Product users and non-users are separated into one of eight categories based on their propensity for change. This spectrum, teamed with demographic data, shows which consumers will be most receptive to a marketer's message.

The Conversion Model also can differentiate between the motivations and market perceptions of non-users likely to switch brands and those unlikely to switch, suggesting specific marketing strategy, Mr. Rice said.

"We'll give you the hot buttons to press," he said.

Its marketers claim the Conversion Model can give early warning of possible share loss; show competitors' vulnerabilities and how a marketer can take advantage of them; and facilitate understanding of consumers' motivations for choosing specific brands.

Agencies have responded well.

"Ad agencies are among our staunchest supporters because the model gives them a creative strategy as well as measurement of how good the advertising is, independent of sales," he said.

The model was introduced in Australia, South Africa and the U.K. in 1988, and is now used in Canada and the U.S. as well. It's been applied to beer, financial services, alcoholic and non-alcoholic beverages, apparel, and cars, used by at least five auto marketers, Mr. Rice said. Projects are under way in the U.S. for restaurants and apparel, car, cigarette and food marketers.

The Conversion Model's ability to measure brand loyalty is especially valuable to marketers considering ad spending cuts.

"As user bonding to your brand increases, your brand is stronger," Mr. Rice said. "Sales could be steady, but [continuing] advertising could make you less vulnerable to attack." □

'Tis the season for CBS

The TV season has been a mixed bag for the networks. While ABC led the ratings for five age groups and NBC for three, CBS was the only network, except in one case, to show any increase from last year's ratings. CBS, the most vocal critic of Nielsen's rating system, hasn't softened its stance on the issue despite its favorable showing. Here are the ratings in each demographic for prime-time season to date, with the percentage of change from the same period last year.

Count on cartography

Researchers plot maps to survey census data

By Patricia Strnad

At least four separate efforts are under way to map out the 1990 census for direct marketers.

R.L. Polk & Co. and Geographic Data Technology; Strategic Mapping; CACI Marketing Systems; and Claritas Corp. have developed systems that combine census data with other geographic and demographic information.

Polk and Geographic Data are developing an address coding guide that enables marketers to match postal addresses with census data. With the guide, Polk can develop mailing lists for direct marketers or analyze a marketer's list and furnish demographic information for small groups.

Polk, a Detroit-based marketing and research company, owns 41% of Geographic Data, Lyme, N.H., a supplier of computer-generated street maps.

The guide is a computer data base that builds on the U.S. Census Bureau's Topologically Integrated Geographic Encoding & Referencing Line files. Tiger is a file of computer-generated maps of all U.S. roads and addresses. Each address is assigned census tract and block group numbers, which identify the demographics of an area, usually 300 to 500 addresses per block group.

For example, if given the census tract and block group number in which an address falls, the Census Bureau can provide median household income for that geographic area, median age, percentage of minorities living there and other data.

Polk charges $5 to $6 per 1,000 addresses for information and will license out software packages for an undisclosed fee. The guide is scheduled to be completed by mid-1991 for use with the 1990 census results released in the fourth quarter of 1991.

The guide will also enable Polk and Geographic Data to create computer-generated value maps color-coded by demographic information, for mall developers, retailers or marketers deciding on new locations.

Strategic Mapping, San Jose, Calif., markets Atlas-GIS, a software package similar to Polk's address coding guide. It uses Census Bureau data and will use the 1990 Tiger file. But unlike Polk's guide, Atlas-GIS enables marketers to combine map files with their own data bases. Through this system, a map highlights the areas where concentrations of consumers matching desired demographics live or work. The software also can provide demographic information for an area and can print out a list of addresses and mailing labels. Introduced last summer, Atlas-GIS costs $2,495.

"The Census Bureau doesn't market [data] in its most convenient form."

Stephen Polk
President, R.L. Polk & Co.

CACI, New York, markets a consumer market segmentation program called Acorn, an acronym for A Classification of Residential Neighborhoods. The data base classifies each of 250,000 neighborhoods defined by the Census Bureau into 44 distinct consumer types, such as "high-income suburban families with young children" and "mainstream Hispanic Americans."

A marketer can provide Acorn with addresses of customers and find out which Acorn segments its customers are coming from. Marketers also can get lists of prospective customers.

Acorn uses Census Bureau data and will use the Tiger files. Depending on what specific information is needed, Acorn can cost between $1,000 to $100,000.

Similarly, Claritas, Alexandria, Va., sells a market segmentation system called Prizm, which stands for Potential Rating Index by ZIP Markets. Prizm classifies all U.S. neighborhoods into 40 basic lifestyle segments, or clusters. Like its competitors, Claritas' system matches Census Bureau data with postal ZIP codes.

The Census Bureau created Tiger in 1986 to help administer the 1990 and future censuses, and now is making the data available to marketers, developers and statisticians.

But "the Census Bureau has no commitment to keep Tiger current," said Stephen Polk, president of Polk. "New streets, addresses and subdivisions are dedicated continually, but there are no cross-references to them and no record of them within Tiger."

When Polk and Geographic Data discover an address absent from the Tiger file, the companies research its location and block group to match the address with Census Bureau demographics.

If a new subdivision is in a block group that has no history—for example, if it were built on an undeveloped piece of land—Polk would conduct research to develop statistics for the subdivision. Polk uses information such as automobile registrations, demographics of the surrounding community and housing prices.

"Marketers could send us a list of their clients or prospects and we could identify the block group and census tract on all the addresses," Mr. Polk said. "They could then get the data itself from the Census Bureau. . . . [but] the Census Bureau doesn't market it in its most convenient form."

"The Census Bureau's not trying to create marketing data bases," he said. "Once the census is completed, the bureau isn't going to put forth any effort to maintain this data base until the year 2000." □

RESEARCH BRIEFS

Researchers rank top issues: "Improving the utilization of market information" was voted the No. 1 concern for 1990-92 by the trustees of Marketing Science Institute. The ranking helps set priorities for institute-sponsored research programs. Rounding out the top five were: "measuring and managing brand equity"; "developing a market-driven, customer-oriented organization"; "improving processes for developing new products and services"; and "understanding, measuring and managing service quality."

Anything bad to say about that new Nissan ad? No sirree, Bob!

(Rating: ★ ★ ★ ½)

By Bob Garfield

Garfield

A prominent image in a new spot for the Nissan Sentra SE-R sport sedan is a yellow road sign bearing the message: YIELD TO BOB.

My sentiments exactly.

In this oppressive world of immovable Freds, intransigent Dennises and unswerving Valeries, yielding to Bob has become something of a lost art. More's the pity. Bob has a lot to contribute, if only people would put aside their petty self-interest, subordinate their own stubborn prejudices and completely submit to Bob's will.

Leland Palmer notwithstanding, is that so wrong?

The enlightened creatives at Chiat/Day/Mojo, Venice, Calif., probably think they've just added a wrinkle to their yearlong fantasy campaign, but they've actually stumbled onto a psychographic mother lode and a shining proposition for the New World Order, by which I mean not a bankrupt Soviet bloc but rather a thoroughly Bobcentric universe.

At last, Everyman has access to a performance sedan—the Nissan Sentra SE-R—as dramatized in a hilarious, Bobcentric view of the world, from Chiat/Day/Mojo.

Even if "Twin Peaks" peters out, 1991 has all the makings of the Year of Bob. Not only will the end of 1990 bring the first digital palindrome in 110 years—demanding a palindromic namesake like Bob to go with it—events in Eastern Europe and the Persian Gulf will foment much hubbub and commotion, which, of course, is bobbery.

Finally, in May, from Dell Publishing comes: "The Bob Book," the definitive trade paperback on Bobness.

So when this 30-second commercial opens, with a shot of L.A. freeway gridlock, the narrator's motoring fantasy is so much more than idle daydream; it is the antidote to discombobulation.

"If I could afford a sports sedan," he says, "the road would belong to me . . . Bob." Whereupon he jerks his sleek, black Sentra into second gear and pulls onto Bob's Expressway.

"I'd have one of those multivalve engines, independent suspension [he zooms through a tollbooth with a BOB lane], and of course a spoiler on the back ['Go Bob' green traffic signal]. Yeah, if I could afford a sports sedan ['No Parking Except for Bob' sign], life would be a cruise."

Here a motorcycle cop approaches the car, apparently after having flagged the Sentra down. "Oh," the CHiP says apologetically, "It's you, Bob." Then the voice-over says, "Introducing the new Nissan Sentra SE-R. Because rich guys shouldn't have all the fun."

Note the attention to detail. In contriving the "Bob" props, art director Corey Stolberg and director Bill Wertz are utterly faithful to roadside reality. While precisely matching typefaces is, to borrow from the foreword to an old collection of Harvard Lampoon parodies, "about as difficult as dialing a telephone," the fact is it's exactly the sort of detail frequently forsaken—even in feature films—resulting in jarring moments of compromised verisimilitude.

But this spot, written by Tom Witt, offers far more than a cute premise and good signage. The tour de Bob is also a psychographic tour de force, a sort of video aphrodisiac for the flaccid, benumbed, put-upon Bobs of the world.

Anyone ever cut off by a speeding, traffic weaving young underachiever recognizes the inverse relationship between worldly success and driving aggression. His car is not only a phallic extension; it is a bludgeon, wielded with impunity by an impotent working stiff empowered in no other way. Bob is the frustrated Everyman who longs for a sport sedan in which to have his way with the world, but Bob can't shell out $20,000 for the Nissan Maxima of his dreams. That car's the province of guys named Garth and Blake and maybe even Rance.

Enter the Sentra SE-R—the R, I suppose, being for Robert.

Or maybe for relief, from middle-class pressure and advertising convention. This spot proves that you can unabashedly exploit simmering class envy without either talking down to the working man or resorting to sophomoric caricatures of the well-to-do. Thrumming Bob's throttle, in other words, without running Rance off the road.

Restraint in car advertising, like the affordable performance sedan and Bob's Expressway, is an idea whose time has come. Granted, 1990 was kind of rough for the car industry and Laura Palmer. But speaking for Bobs everywhere, 1991 promises to be a hell of a year. □

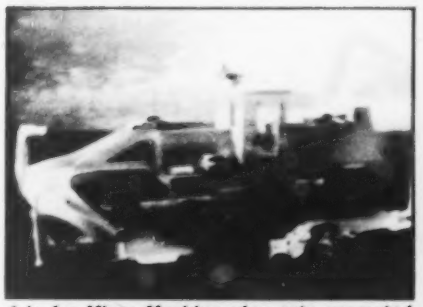
FTC hits Galoob, agency for ads

By Steven W. Colford



Ads for Micro Machine play sets prompted the FTC to investigate Galoob and its agency for deceptive advertising.

WASHINGTON—The Federal Trade Commission last week slapped sanctions on Lewis Galoob Toys and its agency for ads that the FTC said showed toys doing things they really couldn't.

The ads cited by the FTC were for Galoob's Micro Machine toy sets, Xpanders Chopper/Assault Base and Bouncin' Kid Ballerina Kid and aired from 1988 through this year.

Ads show the doll dancing and helicopter flying, both of which require human assistance, the FTC said. They also failed to disclose that assembly was required for certain toy sets.

Under terms of the consent agreement, Galoob and its agency, Towne, Silverstein, Rotter, New York, are prohibited from misrepresenting a toy's ability to move without human assistance and from showing two or more non-identical toys not available for purchase together without "clearly and conspicuously" disclosing the toys were sold separately.

In addition, future ads must disclose that assembly is required when a fully assembled Galoob toy that requires assembly is shown in a commercial.

The agreement concludes an FTC investigation that began more than a year ago into such TV spots that aired only on independent stations.

The case involved "some very basic deception issues that were not isolated," said Lee Peeler, associate director of the FTC's Division of Advertising Practices. "There was more than one [deceptive] ad for more than one toy."

Stephen Klein, Galoob exec VP-general counsel, said the company disagreed with the FTC, but agreed to the consent "to save money and be cooperative.

"We've been advertising to children for years and TSR has been producing ads to children for years, and this comes down to a difference of opinion, a matter of interpretation," Mr. Klein said.

The company has received only "a few consumer complaints in the last few years," he said.

For Galoob, the regulatory action represents another setback in a troubled year. Galoob sales for the first nine months of 1990 were $105.4 million, down 37.9% from a year earlier, reported L.H. Alton & Co., a research brokerage firm.

As for including the agency in the settlement, FTC attorney Joel Winston said the misleading ads "represented the sorts of violations that an agency ought to be familiar with and know to avoid. This was not an instance where there is scientific substantiation involved that an agency might accept on faith . . . but rather basic issues about how to put an ad together."

The agency didn't return phone calls.

Mr. Winston suggested it was more than coincidence that the ads in question never appeared on network stations.

"Toy ads over the years have gotten better because of the networks' review process, and maybe Galoob found a way to bypass them, and when you do that, you stand a better chance of getting ads like these on the air."

Galoob joins toy marketers Hasbro, Mattel and General Mills, among others, currently operating under an FTC consent agreement for deceptive toy ads, Mr. Peeler said.

The FTC, by virtue of the agreement, "is saying it will look hard for substantiation, and also that the FTC is back. I'm sure we're going to see more cases from the FTC soon involving national advertisers," said Wally Snyder, exec VP of the American Advertising Federation and a former FTC official.

At the American Association of Advertising Agencies, Exec VP Hal Shoup noted that it had been "a long time since a case like this where an agency and an advertiser were named. I think that is the difference in this case, and I think that's a good reflection on the overall quality of advertising." □

Debate swirls 'round Riney's Aspen ads

By Alice Z. Cuneo

Theirs was the glitziest little town in the West. His was the biggest marketing gun around.

So, when the folks from Aspen, Colo., decided they had to protect their ski coffers from nearby Vail and other rivals, they knew exactly the man they wanted to hire: Hal Riney. And they dug down deep into their pockets to help convince him to accept the account.

Hal Riney & Partners rode into town in November 1988, fixing to attract more skiers to Aspen.

Now, as another ski season unfolds, Aspenites are indeed engaged in battle—with one another—over the effectiveness of Riney's soft-sell approach and whether hiring the San Francisco agency was worth it.

One side of the debate is typified by Michael Sura, an Aspen pizzeria owner, who states, "I think they shot themselves in the foot."

Mr. Sura calls the Riney advertising "horrible" and partly blames it for a 12% drop in his business last year.

For this season, however, Riney has changed the advertising. And the client, Aspen Skiing Co., says it loves the new campaign.

Some Aspenites wonder why a Riney ad this winter (top) uses antique ski equipment, while earlier ads for the skiing mecca didn't mention the sport at all.

Jim Magill, Riney senior VP-account group director, in turn praises the client for "letting us do great work."

But Aspenites, a fractious lot, hold

Marketers offer green standards

Industry seeks to beat states to punch

By Jennifer Lawrence

SAN DIEGO—A new group formed by marketers plans to petition the Federal Trade Commission next month to adopt its proposal for the first-ever national green guidelines.

The industry working group will be one step ahead of state regulators, who are calling for more restrictive standards.

Proposals from the industry group, which doesn't carry a formal name, are now in the final draft stage.

The group went public for the first time last week at hearings here on environmental marketing conducted by a task force of 10 state attorneys general. State officials were seeking reaction to their set of preliminary guidelines, intended as input to the FTC.

The industry proposal is likely to set off a national debate among environmental groups, state regulators and federal officials over how restrictive or liberal national green guidelines should be. The proposal is likely to fall short of state regulators' goal of requiring specific standards for making green claims.

Packaging moves to the green forefront—Page 30.

"Rather than going through this [states' open hearing] process, they're going directly to the FTC," California Attorney General John Van de Kamp said when asked for his reaction to the industry group's plan. "It's too bad because I think they could have contributed

New Maybelline line targets blacks

By Pat Sloan

Maybelline Co. will put new color into the cosmetics business when it introduces Shades of You, a makeup line targeted at black consumers.

The collection of face and lip makeup marks the first time a major cosmetics company has addressed black women with a separate line in the mass market.

Shades of You bows in February, with print ads and radio commercials breaking in the spring, a company spokeswoman said. Sources close to the company said TV, outdoor and other media are being considered.

Maybelline President Bob Hiatt said DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, the agency that lost Maybelline's $35 million account earlier this fall to Lintas:New York, is handling the effort.

Executives at Maybelline wouldn't disclose the ad and promotion budget, and it wasn't clear whether DDB Needham would continue to work on the brand after its launch.

The agency, which is producing and completing work approved before the account switch, has been involved with the development of Shades of You dating back at least two years to the early planning stages, sources said.

"It's a smart move. . . . Instead of going eyeball to eyeball with Cover Girl, [Maybelline] can go for a specific segment. . . . That's shrewd."

Black women account for at least 15% of

Avrett's cut-rate fee for TWA incurs ire

By Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—Avrett, Free & Ginsberg has started a new compensation controversy by agreeing to accept a fee that amounts to a commission rate of just less than 5% from Trans World Airlines.

Avrett won the $48 million account last week after proposing an annual fee of slightly more than $2.2 million, said Shelly Kravitz, TWA's VP-advertising and leisure marketing. The other finalist, Biederman, Kelly & Shaffer, was unwilling to go that low, he said.

"If one [agency] was head and shoulders above the rest, that would be it and forget any differential in fee," Mr. Kravitz said. "But when they're both equal and when there's a divided opinion among eight people, then the fee becomes a consideration."

TWA was shopping for a new agency because its former shop, Young & Rubicam, refused to cut the fee it had been charging and resigned the account in October after four years of handling it.

Agency executives are skeptical that Avrett can earn a profit on the financially shaky airline's account, and some speculate the discount deal will incite first Avrett's, then other agencies', clients.

"What grieves me is seeing an attitude on the part of a major advertiser that apparently is 'I will tell [my agency] how little I will pay them, and if they don't like it there's always another agency that will take it,' " said John O'Toole, president of the American Association of Advertising Agencies. "I think this is highly destructive."

"I think it's an appalling state of affairs," said Lee Anne Morgan, principal in Morgan, Anderson & Co., a consultancy that handles agency compensation matters. "I think it's a very negative way to do business with a reputable agency. I am sorry to see that any agency has agreed to those terms. . . ."

Avrett Chairman Jack Avrett was dismayed that his well-regarded agency, with billings of about $200 million, was being cast as the industry's price cutter and insisted the deal made economic sense for his shop.

"We've agreed on what is to be done, and they're paying us to perform those jobs," he said. "So it's not very complicated at all. It doesn't happen to be related much to the amount of billing that's involved, but we're going to make a fine profit on it."

Mr. Avrett said his other clients have been supportive.

"There's absolutely no sinister feeling on the part of my clients that we're getting screwed or they're getting screwed or that we're not treating everybody properly," he said.

Mr. Avrett said the agency will handle media planning but will pay Mort Keshin & Co., Roslyn, N.Y., to handle buying.

Mr. Kravitz said TWA felt justified in asking for a smaller fee despite the size of its account.

"Why . . . should the agency representing the airline billing $50 million make more than twice as much as the agency representing the airline billing $20 million when the exact same work, almost to an hour, is required?" Mr. Kravitz asked.

Biederman President John Kelly said he'd be willing to take the account if it becomes available again.

"It's an opportunity to get into the big leagues," he said. "If you're an Avrett or ourselves, it puts you on a different playing field." □

Frito, Enrico team up

By Jennifer Lawrence and Patricia Winters

The cola wars' legendary Roger A. Enrico is bringing his Pepsi-Cola marketing savvy to Frito-Lay next year, and for the snack food giant his arrival may be coming not a moment too soon.

PepsiCo last week said Mr. Enrico, 46, will become chairman of the snack foods division in early 1991. President-ceo of PepsiCo Worldwide Beverages since 1987, he assumes the newly created post as Frito-Lay starts its most competitive era ever.

In particular, pricing pressure is rampant in the potato chip segment, causing Frito-Lay to suffer minor dollar-share losses in 1989 in the overall $8 billion salty snack category and the potato chip sector, according to an industry study by John C. Maxwell Jr., analyst with Wheat, First Securities.

Frito-Lay's strategy for 1991 doesn't call for price wars. Instead, the company might rely more on promotions like a buy-one-get-one-free program to fight price cuts from competitors, said Stacy Wehr, manager of public relations.

Among Frito-Lay's national rivals are Anheuser-Busch Cos.' Eagle Snacks, United Biscuits' Keebler Co., Borden's snack unit and Procter & Gamble Co.

R. Enrico

"Roger is a great marketer and a great manager, and I think he'll bring that soft-drink experience to Frito," Mr. Maxwell said. "There's nothing more competitive than the soft-drink industry; he knows how to market and gain share."

"Roger Enrico is an expert in operating in mature, highly competitive environments. . . . He's not afraid to use pricing," said Roy Burry, analyst at Kidder, Peabody & Co.

Mr. Burry believes Frito-Lay hasn't had to go "toe to toe" with competitors yet. Frito holds nearly 50% of the salty snack category.

Frito-Lay's $60 million ad budget is split among three main agencies: DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago; Tracy-Locke, Dallas; and Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver, New York.

Mr. Enrico, who began his PepsiCo career at Frito-Lay in 1971, is perhaps best known for taking advantage of Coca-Cola Co.'s fiasco with new Coke, documented in his book, "The Other Guy Blinked: How Pepsi Won the Cola Wars." He was also behind the $10 million deal to sign entertainer Michael Jackson.

Mr. Enrico's move is part of several top PepsiCo management shifts.

Michael Jordan, 54, becomes chairman of newly created PepsiCo International, which combines the overseas soft-drink and foods divisions. Mr. Jordan had been chairman of Frito-Lay and president-ceo of PepsiCo Worldwide Foods.

His title at Worldwide Foods is being eliminated; Mr. Enrico's former position won't be filled.

Frito-Lay President Robert Beeby will report to Mr. Enrico. Mr. Beeby earlier had said he planned to retire at the end of 1991. □

Investor interest in WPP

By Gary Levin and Laurel Wentz

With WPP Group's stock at bargain-basement prices, analysts and current and former WPP executives are saying potential investors are circling the world's biggest agency holding company.

WPP's market value dropped 75% in the past month; on Friday, the stock closed in New York at 3⅜.

WPP Group Chief Executive Martin Sorrell said Friday "a large number of people have expressed interest" in taking an equity stake since the stock plunge began. But he maintained the company could handle its financial problems on its own.

"We have control over our own destiny," Mr. Sorrell said at the PaineWebber Conference on the Outlook for Media. "We can take care of our cash needs."

Several sources are saying investment bankers have begun exploring the possibility of brokering the sale of WPP's assets or a minority investment in the company.

Sources close to Dentsu, Japan's largest agency, say it had been approached by an undisclosed investment banker seeking to determine its interest. Dentsu's response couldn't be learned, but a source said the agency wouldn't act without consulting with

McD's latest: Cold McSubs

Menu battle gets hotter; new battles with Pizza Hut

By Scott Hume

McDonald's Corp. is taking on the fast-growing submarine sandwich chains in one market while increasing its challenge to Pizza Hut in two others.

Not standing still, Pizza Hut is embarking on a new marketing strategy using in-store videos as the fast-food war between the two leaders continues to rage.

McDonald's, working to revamp its menu and lower prices to boost domestic sales, has started testing a line of cold sandwiches under the McSubs name in a dozen stores in Madison, Wis.

The test also gives McDonald's a chance to see whether it can take sales from the burgeoning submarine sandwich category, especially Subway.

The 19th-largest restaurant chain, Subway was the industry's fastest grower last year and is likely to keep the title for 1990 in a market estimated at $150 billion. Subway's sales jumped 58% to $782 million in 1989, according to Nation's Restaurant News, which projects a 40.1% increase to $1.1 billion for 1990.

The McSubs line is available at lunchtime and dinner. So, too, are the new 6-inch "personal" pizzas.

Subway is expected to top 5,000 stores by the end of this year, ranking fifth in number of stores.

The McDonald's McSubs line includes a Veggie sandwich for $1.99; Turkey, Deluxe and Ham & Cheese subs for $2.39; and

Ad spending hikes may lag inflation

By Gary Levin and Jon Lafayette

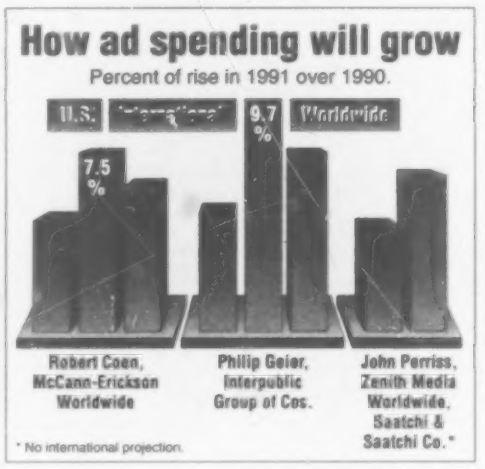
NEW YORK—Ad spending growth in 1991 may not outpace inflation, say the industry's leading prognosticators.

At last week's 18th annual PaineWebber "Outlook for the Media" conference, Robert Coen, senior VP-director of forecasting at McCann-Erickson Worldwide, said U.S. ad spending will climb only 4.6% to an estimated $136 billion, and overseas growth will slow to 7.5%, for a worldwide gain of 6.1% to $292.4 billion.

But real U.S. growth, with 5% inflation factored in, puts ad growth at –0.4%.

Mr. Coen said the major problem area in this country is local advertising, particularly newspapers, where this year ad spending rose a paltry 1% over 1989 and classified advertising declined for the first time since 1980.

Spending on national broadcast media will be up 6.1% in 1991, Mr. Coen said, and he cited as one encouraging sign his estimate that Procter & Gamble Co. will have boosted ad spending this year by 24.5%, to $1.1 billion, excluding recent acquisitions.



JOHN HALL/HOLLY SEGUINE

Total 1990 U.S. ad spending will be up 4.9%, without accounting for inflation, to $130 billion, Mr. Coen said, far less than the 6.2% growth rate for 1990 he predicted a year ago.

Overseas ad spending will rise 12.6% in 1990, a healthy gain, and ad spending growth worldwide will reach 8.9% this year to an estimated $275.6 billion, he said.

France, Japan and Spain are among the fastest-growing major overseas ad markets, he said.

On the more pessimistic side, PaineWebber analyst Alan Gottesman predicted U.S. ad spending will be flat in the first half of 1991 and up 4% or 5% in the second half, for a total average gain of just 2%.

Another forecaster, Zenith Media Worldwide, a London-based unit of Saatchi & Saatchi Co., sees U.S. spending up only 3.1% this year and 4% in 1991, but the real

HOT STUFF!

The Advertising Council last week unveiled its latest holiday season flight of anti-drunken-driving commercials in White House ceremonies with President Bush looking on. This year, the spots feature a new tagline: "Take the keys, call a cab, take a stand." Wells, Rich, Greene, New York, handles.

The Beef Industry Council takes its "Real food for real people" TV campaign to the Little Italy neighborhood of New York in a spot breaking Dec. 26. The commercial continues the council's campaign focusing on towns with unusual names. Ketchum Advertising, San Francisco, handles.

Ford spotlighting brands, not rebates

By Raymond Serafin

Brand building gets a new emphasis at Ford Motor Co. with the No. 2 automaker's decision last week to drop most of its consumer rebate and incentive programs.

"We want to get away from distress merchandising," said Robert Rewey, VP-sales operations for Ford's North American Automotive Operations.

The Ford executive said the time is right for a new marketing tack because "we have a very extensive amount of new product in 1991 and continuing into 1992."

"We've been guilty of trying to move the sales needle daily, instead of investing in improving the image of our brands."

By providing promotional money to dealers instead of customers, the Ford and Lincoln-Mercury divisions plan to focus national ad efforts on product virtues and image enhancement instead of on advertising the latest in a series of deals that have been ongoing almost without interruption for more than four years.

J. Walter Thompson USA, Detroit, handles Ford Division and Young & Rubicam handles Lincoln-Mercury. Last year, Ford spent $400 million in measured media for Ford and Lincoln-Mercury auto ads.

Ford's domestic rivals, General Motors Corp. and Chrysler Corp., are closely watching the move and will almost certainly follow suit if Ford can sustain its share of market.

"I'd like nothing better than to get out from underneath those [consumer] incentives," said GM Chairman Robert Stempel. "They've sort of played out, and right now with consumer confidence where it is,

Lite looks elsewhere

Miller tests non-Backer ads on product quality

By Ira Teinowitz

A possible crack has opened in the 11-year relationship between Miller Brewing Co. and Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York, with the brewer asking another agency to produce Miller Lite commercials.

Two product-quality TV spots shown last week to Miller distributors during the brewer's biennial conference in San Francisco are believed to have been created by either Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, which handles Miller High Life, or Frankenberry, Laughlin & Constable, Milwaukee, agency for Leinenkugel's beer and no-alcohol Sharp's.

Miller officials confirmed the commercials weren't done by Backer but declined to reveal which agency produced the spots because no decision has been made about whether they will air.

Miller's agency roster also includes J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago, on Lowenbrau, and Wieden & Kennedy, Portland, Ore., believed to be doing project work on dry beers.

Backer has done all advertising for Miller Lite since shortly after William Backer and Carl Spielvogel left McCann-Erickson in 1979 to form their own agency. The agency's executives created the "Less filling, tastes great" campaign in 1977, while at McCann; the theme is still carried in most Lite advertising.

Miller spent $64 million on Lite advertising last year, a figure it's expected to slightly exceed for 1990. Backer also handles Miller Genuine Draft, now Miller's fastest-growing beer (and a $54 million account), and Genuine Draft Lite, now testing in 11 states.

Miller Senior VP-Marketing Charles Schmid said last week Genuine Draft growth this year will surpass last year's ad spending rate, with its own inflation rate factored out, is –0.2% in the U.S. and –0.67% in the U.K., said John Perriss, chairman-ceo.

Tepid ad spending

In a separate presentation to analysts, Omnicom Group Chairman-CEO Bruce Crawford predicted "flattened" earnings for the next two or three quarters due to slowed revenue growth in the U.S. and continuing problems in the U.K., where general advertising revenues are down 20%.

He said client spending at Bernard Hodes Advertising, a large recruitment agency, and Doremus & Co., a financial services agency, has "collapsed in recent weeks."

Mr. Crawford said 1990 earnings should meet analysts' projections. He added that despite stricter guidelines on capital spending, Omnicom won't resort to layoffs or elimination of bonuses unless "the performance of our major companies worsens dramatically," in which case there's ample room to trim those expenses.

"We're not seeing disaster facing us in terms of our major agencies," he said. "At this stage, we don't see anything getting much worse."

Fred Meyer, Omnicom's chief financial officer, projected U.S. ad revenues will climb 4% to 5% next year, while overseas revenues will grow 8% to 9%, without inflation factored in.

"Based on our track record, we believe we can do at least as well as the industry," Mr. Meyer said.

Interpublic Group of Cos. Chairman-CEO Philip H. Geier Jr. had a more upbeat forecast for the industry.

Mr. Geier predicted U.S. ad spending will climb 5% in 1991 and international spending will be up 9.7%, for a total worldwide increase of 7.5%. None of his figures accounted for inflation.

He said his estimates were slightly more optimistic than those of Mr. Coen, who works for one of Mr. Geier's agencies, because he believes marketers will move to "protect their market share by spending through" the recession.

He added that marketers are also setting more realistic marketing plans for 1991, which should lessen the need to make budget cuts to bolster profits.

To assure Interpublic's financial position, Mr. Geier said the company is building a 3% reserve into its agencies' 1991 budgets that can't be spent until the second half of the year.

He added that given the financial weakness of British-owned Saatchi & Saatchi and WPP Group, Interpublic should have an advantage.

"Lean and mean agencies with money to invest will succeed," he said.

"1991 will be very difficult" for Saatchi, said Simon Mellor, director of corporate communications. While the agency has been successful in retaining clients, he said, those clients have shown little inclination to raise budgets from 1990 levels.

Mr. Mellor added that if revenues don't grow, head count would be further reduced from its current level of about 1,300. Saatchi CEO Robert Louis-Dreyfus has told analysts the company eliminated about 700 jobs in 1990.

Also, Mr. Mellor said the company had retained two investment bankers to get as many ideas as possible to, at some time next year, restructure its $324 million debt from a Euroconvertible share issue that comes due in 1993.

He said that, in hindsight, Saatchi was pleased with the sales of its consulting divisions. Although the company lost money on the sales, the price wouldn't have improved by waiting, Mr. Mellor said. He added that Saatchi has no timetable for selling its two remaining consulting companies and will wait until economic conditions improve.

Saatchi last week announced the sale of McCaffrey & McCall to its managers, who paid $2 million in cash and borrowed $15 million from Saatchi at 9% interest. Mr. Mellor said there are no plans to sell any of Saatchi's other agencies. [ ]

Super Bowl redux: Coke vs. Pepsi

By Patricia Winters and Wayne Walley

Coca-Cola Co. and Pepsi-Cola Co. will once again use halftime during the Super Bowl as a playing ground for the cola wars.

This week, Coca-Cola is expected to announce that it will rely on a high-tech promotion like its 3-D commercial during 1989's Super Bowl and its "3-D sound" spot during the 1990 Super Bowl.

The promotion for Super Bowl XXV reportedly involves distributing with Diet Coke packaging encoded game pieces revealing prizes ranging from Diet Coke coupons to $1 million. Every game piece wins a prize.

When held up to the TV screen during the Diet Coke commercial, a special signal decodes a patch on the card to reveal the prize. The technology has been used before in print but is believed to be a first for network TV.

Coca-Cola is sponsoring the Super Bowl halftime show. The company declined to comment on its plans. Lintas:New York handles Diet Coke.

Pepsi-Cola also won't comment except to say its Super Bowl program will "be big and great," said Gary Gerdemann, manager of public relations.

Pepsi reportedly was looking to draw people away from the Diet Coke promotion with its own halftime extravaganza on another network or cable. But those plans have been dropped, sources say.

Apparently there was internal disagreement at Pepsi about what to do for the Super Bowl, one source said.

Pepsi considered a show opposite the Super Bowl halftime. But, the source said, "This would be an escalation of guerrilla marketing and rather than promoting the Super Bowl—which Pepsi has spent a large sum to sponsor—they would have been promoting tune-out."

Another problem would have been coordinating the airtime for the show, since the length of the first half of a football game can be unpredictable. The source said Pepsi also bought time during the third quarter of the game, creating a huge risk for a competing halftime show.

"If you've already spent $800,000 for each 30-second spot in the third quarter—let's say the game is a blowout and you've encouraged people to tune out during the half—you really run a risk of screwing up your investment," the source said. "If Pepsi had done it, it would have had only more public relations value than anything."

Pepsi's agency is BBDO Worldwide. [ ]

is the world's sixth-largest advertising group.

Mr. de Pouzilhac said Eurocom wants to increase the number of international clients using the network in the U.S. and Europe. Currently 55% of Eurocom's billings come from France.

Eurocom will also be looking to acquire a New York agency, which could put it in direct competition with its former partners at HDM.

Agencies that Eurocom and the Dentsu-Y&R joint venture are likely to approach include Ally & Gargano; Rosenfeld, Sirowitz Humphrey & Strauss; and Warwick Baker & Fiore, sources say.

Eurocom has no plans to enter Japan, where the French group is unlikely to be welcomed after offending Dentsu.

Mr. de Pouzilhac said the breakup with Y&R and Dentsu, engineered by Eurocom on the grounds that U.S. partner Y&R failed to provide clients for the network, won't cost him much business.

"In five years, not one single American budget came from the U.S.," he said.

To avoid client conflict, Eurocom will continue to operate HDM and EWDB offices separately in countries such as the U.K., Spain and Italy where the international Peugeot car account conflicts with local EWDB business from Fiat and BMW. Offices in markets with more compatible client lists will merge.

"We have a few conflicts between international and local budgets," Mr. de Pouzilhac said. "In certain countries we now have a second agency, and because this is a local conflict we will separate the accounts between two different agencies. When we do not have two agencies, the priority will be with the international client ... meaning, clearly, that Eurocom Advertising will be working with Peugeot, with BSN, with L'Oreal in all the countries of the world."

Jacques Puzenap, Peugeot's international marketing director, said, "We are aware that our competitors use EWDB agencies elsewhere in Europe for local campaigns. But unless they decide to merge these in with HDM, or develop an international campaign, I don't see any problem. Should this arise, of course, Eurocom would have a choice to make."

A source close to Fiat agreed separate Eurocom agencies don't pose a conflict problem.

However, Mr. de Pouzilhac said one of his priorities is to tone down Eurocom's French aspect.

Jean de Yturbe, who ran HDM for three years and is now ceo of EWDB, will be appointed ceo of Eurocom Advertising. Jerry Della Femina, chairman-ceo of Della Femina McNamee, New York, and Robin Wight, chairman of WCRS in London, will add the titles of vice chairmen of the new network. A number of VP positions will also be created and filled by the heads of some of the main Eurocom agencies to further diversify Eurocom's management.

Four of Eurocom's five largest clients—Peugeot, L'Oreal, Group BSN and Chanel—are French. The fifth, Henkel, is German. [ ] too many things at once to its consumers, and it's confusing them," said Rick Nelson, a retail analyst with Duff & Phelps. "Penney's is also trying to alter its image with consumers and the timing isn't right."

Retail

Penney's overall earnings are expected to decline by about 20% for the year due to continued weakness in same-store sales and greater-than-expected promotions.

"It's not possible to speculate at this point what percentage gains or specific market share losses we'll see this season," Mr. Nelson said.

Conventional upper-middle-market department stores including Bloomingdale's, R.H. Macy & Co., Lord & Taylor, Neiman Marcus Co. and Saks Fifth Avenue are expected to lose some share of overall sales dollars due to the aggressive price cutting of competitors, analysts say.

"All of the upscale department stores are struggling this holiday season because they can't afford to cut prices since they operate on higher margins. Bloomingdale's and Macy's are perfect examples, especially because they rely on full-price purchases during the holiday sales season," Mr. Steidtmann said.

But some observers disagree.

"With all these years of price promoting, one more promotional Christmas isn't going to change much positively or negatively," said Judith Owens, VP-sales promotion/marketing at the National Retail Federation.

"Dayton Hudson Corp., Dillard's and the May Co. won't suffer as much because they target more middle-market audiences and they've got a little more flexibility, but everyone's inventories will be very lean going into 1991," Mr. Steidtmann said.

Dayton Hudson will suffer minimal damage this season "because it's one of the few companies that has both ends of the retail spectrum covered," said Mr. Nelson at Duff & Phelps.

Dayton Hudson's Target "upscale discount" division of 432 stores—which account for half of the company's total revenues—is thriving this season, while it's Mervyn's middle-market apparel division accounts for 30%; its department store division represents only 15% of its total revenues.

"People know where to go to look for values, and Target already has that perception. Across the board, we're emphasizing values and basics in our merchandise," said Ann Barkelew, VP-corporate public relations for Dayton Hudson.

Dillard's Department Stores expects overall sales gains of 20% and same-store sales gains of 10% for the fourth quarter, Mr. Whyte said.

Wal-Mart is expected to report about a 26% increase in overall sales for the fourth quarter ending January. Same-store sales are expected to increase about 7%. [ ]

ADREVIEW

1990: A year spent reinforcing old ideas

By Bob Garfield

Garfield

Clip and save.

This is the annual ADREVIEW Year in Review review, 12 solid months of advertising triumphs and disasters, neatly packaged for you, the reader, so that we, the writer, can skate by with a minimum of actual new material and get in the proper frame of mind for the Blockbuster Bowl.

The tendency would be to call 1990 the Year of Super Reinforcement. In the whimsy 'n' death category we had Reebok's Bungee Jumpers: two daredevils plunging from a bridge, attached at the feet to outsize rubber bands. One of them, not shod in Reebok's Pump shoes to super reinforce his ankles, plummets (What a great gag!) to the rocks below.

Then, of course, super reinforced Huggies pushed out the envelope of product description for those diaper consumers incapable of putting No. 2 and No. 2 together. For a while, at least, the ads discussed not "messy leaks," which we guess was too imprecise, but "messy BM leaks," which certainly solved the puzzle for us.

Finally, there was the super reinforcement to end all super reinforcements: Volvo's "monster truck" spot. We were so busy marveling at Volvo's new Industrial I-Beams Surreptitiously Welded Into the Passenger Compartment option, we nearly failed to notice the commercial's elitist slur against the working class: "Apparently not everyone appreciates the strength of a Volvo."

So, yes, 1990 would seem to be TV advertisers' Super Reinforcing Year. But it wasn't. As far as ADREVIEW is concerned, it was a Super Disappointing Year—beginning, naturally, with the Super Bowl.

Hype surrounding the game lately has been matched, if not eclipsed, by the hype surrounding TV spots produced for it. Yet Coca-Cola's big surround-sound blowout—a high-fructose corn syrup version of 1971's "I'd like to buy the world a Coke" mountaintop mawk-a-thon—was the only spot to live up to its billing.

Nike's "Announcers" spot proved that big-name sportscasters, amazingly glib in the heat of play-by-play battle, sound stilted and stiff when reading from a script. Nissan's stunning Turbo Z spot, featuring a space-age high-speed chase, was a reckless celebration of raw power. And even the annual Michael J. Fox spot for Diet Pepsi, this one set in a Wagnerian opera, lacked the comic crispness we've come to expect.

Expectations unfulfilled were to mark the entire year. Oh, the 51 spots that got ratings weren't, cumulatively, any worse than 1989's batch; for what little it's worth, the average rating was 2.62 stars, vs. 2.66 a year ago. But in terms of advertising opportunities exploited to their fullest, this was the year that wasn't.

After a 1989 that gave us both "Bo knows" and the first Energizer bunny, two great chapters in advertising history, 1990 seemed to have endless possibilities. Instead, at times, it seemed like endless drivel: a Barbasol shaving gel spot trading on old unfunny jokes, Snapple Beverages trading on new unfunny jokes, Soviet jeans trading on sickening pseudophilosophy, Calvin Klein jeans trading on sophomoric sexuality and Burger King—in print ads—trading on seamy sanctimony.

Volvo, Chrysler, Ultra Slim-Fast and Saturn Corp. were part of the super year in advertising—super disappointing.

There were bright spots, of course, principally those that were both executionally and strategically inventive: Lee Iacocca's Advantage: Chrysler assault on reverse chauvinism when it comes to American cars; Spike Lee's magnificent visits with idiosyncratic exemplars of Levi's 501 self-expression; SkyTel's vivid, visual metaphors for business warfare; and General Motors' long-awaited mea culpa for the past 20 years of automotive malfeasance.

Ultimately, though, the year was epitomized by two new-product campaigns, both delivering the long-awaited news about potentially revolutionary brands: Simple Pleasures, the fake-fat ice cream, and Saturn, the fake-Japanese car.

These fledgling brands represent the essence of American technological and marketing innovation, sparing no effort to provide what the consumer has said he wants and standing for everything American industry must do to compete in the next century. But the advertising conveys none of that significance, none of that excitement, none of the technological wonder.

The ads were pretty good—say, 2.62 stars apiece—but not good enough. Let's hope that the 1991 campaigns will be better, which is to say: different. The last thing we need in the New Year is last year's lackluster ideas reheated and, like Cristina Ferrare's civil-engineered "slenderizing" get-up in her Ultra Slim-Fast commercial, super reinforced. □

Italian sub for $2.59. In-store materials support the test; Laurence, Charles, Free & Lawson, Milwaukee, handles the Madison operators' co-op.

Although several of McDonald's menu tests—such as pizza, fried chicken and pasta—have been aimed at boosting after-4 p.m. business, the McSubs line is available at lunchtime and dinner.

So, too, are new 6-inch "personal" pizzas for lunch being tried in Evansville, Ind., and selected stores in Chicago—a direct swipe at Pizza Hut. Before this test, McDonald's had been selling full-size pizzas in a half-dozen markets, including Evansville and Chicago.

McDonald's says it intends to add lower-price menu items without having to hurt profits through discounting, and individual pizzas help. In Evansville, the mini-pizzas sell for $1.89 to $2.19, compared with $6.25 to $9.99 for full-size pizza; in Chicago, they range from $2.25 to $2.65, compared with $8.49 and up for 12-inch pizzas.

McDonald's individual pizzas are targeted to the Personal Pan Pizzas that are the backbone of Pizza Hut's lunch business. But restaurant industry sources say the PepsiCo chain is preparing a surprise for McDonald's in its own back yard.

Next month, Pizza Hut stores in four Chicago suburbs will be fitted with "video juke boxes" that can entertain customers while they wait for their pizzas.

Depositing a quarter in one of the juke boxes with 6-inch screens—20 of which will be installed in each test store—gives the viewer 5 minutes of viewing on one of five channels.

Program content on the five channels will be cartoons, rock videos, highlights of old TV programs such as "Candid Camera" and "I Love Lucy"; vintage newsreels; and, later, a channel offering commercials.

Sources say the commercial channel, if added later as planned, would feature PepsiCo products such as snacks from Frito-Lay and Pepsi-Cola soft drinks, and, possibly, non-competing products from other companies.

Pizza Hut couldn't be reached for comment on the test.

McDonald's, the largest single restaurant chain, has been battling hard against PepsiCo, the largest restaurant operator, for several years now. McDonald's has looked at Mexican foods, such as the current Breakfast Burrito test, to undercut PepsiCo's Taco Bell; fried chicken to undermine Kentucky Fried Chicken Corp.; and pizza and pasta to combat Pizza Hut.

Pizza Hut has run TV spots gently poking fun at the deficiencies of the initial McDonald's pizza, and KFC earlier this year took a shot at McDonald's with a TV jab at Ronald McDonald and the burger chain's string of in-store promotions and games. □ could produce advertising he liked.

Mr. Bloom, who died in 1983, is considered a pioneer in the use of TV for local retail, an idea once unthinkable for a medium considered the sole domain of national advertisers.

Mr. Bloom's son, Bob, is chairman-ceo of the agency. He called the Hall of Fame honor "a particularly fitting recognition because he had two careers—one long and successful one in the newspaper business, then in something he knew nothing of.

"To reward someone for their entrepreneurial spirit is a very good thing," Mr. Bloom said. "He built his business from what was then the unlikely place of Dallas. I learned two important things from him: that ethics starts at the top, and [to] be very aggressive and deliberate about what you're doing."

Phil Dougherty was considered a consummate scribe of the ad industry for more than two decades, both praising and criticizing the industry he wrote about. A native of the Bronx, Mr. Dougherty joined the Times in 1942, working as a copy boy, clerk, and society and metro reporter before penning his first ad column on Oct. 3, 1966.

During the 22 years he wrote the daily advertising news column, Mr. Dougherty became one of the industry's most well-known figures and, by dint of his personality, an all-time favorite. He was known for his sparkling, quick wit; his stylish, clear writing; his doggedness in pursuing news stories; and his outbursts of impatience—or irascibility (often premeditated), usually directed at overbearing executives or public relations people who he felt had fallen short of his high journalistic standards.

At industry conventions and meetings, Mr. Dougherty would be very much in evidence (usually in a green jacket and wild, multicolored slacks), chatting, jotting notes, moving from one cluster of executives to another as he gathered material for his column and his morning radio show on WQXR. He died in 1988. □

Scali taps Fallon to bolster agency after Volvo fiasco

By Gary Levin

NEW YORK—Scali, McCabe, Sloves has reinforced its management lineup one month after the Volvo ad scandal and a string of account losses.

Patrick Fallon last week became vice chairman of SMS North America, while still remaining chairman of Fallon McElligott. SMS is the holding company for

Steve Wall

P. Fallon M. Sloves

Scali's Canadian offices and flagship New York office. Minneapolis-based Fallon and the Martin Agency in Richmond, Va.

Mr. Fallon said his main task will be to help bolster the beleaguered Scali and restore client confidence in the agency.

In separate developments, Dean Stefanides and Larry Hampel, the senior VP-group creative directors responsible for the Volvo "monster truck"-crushing spot, have left Scali and will join Chiat/Day/Mojo as creative group heads.

In addition, Scali's vice chairman and New York creative director, Robert Levenson, 61, is retiring after three years at the agency. A successor will be chosen by Mr. Fallon and Sam Scali, the agency's president.

Messrs. Stefanides and Hampel supervised all Volvo Cars of North America's advertising, handled by Scali since the agency's founding in 1967. Scali resigned the $40 million account under pressure last month after it was learned the "monster truck" spot had been rigged.

Scali Chairman-CEO Marvin Sloves claimed the agency didn't ask for the team's resignations.

He said an investigation by the agency's law firm has found no evidence that anyone from Scali tampered with the cars used in the ads or gave anyone else permission to do so.

Independent investigations by Volvo and the Federal Trade Commission are continuing.

The agency is struggling to weather controversy over the rigged Volvo ads and to overcome a major account losing streak.

A long-planned majority buyback from London-based WPP Group has been stalled by lack of financing, and agency executives say the recent losing streak and Volvo mess don't make things any easier.

Mr. Sloves said he will now devote his energies to completing the buyback and overseeing Scali's international offices, leaving the flagship office in Mr. Fallon's hands.

"He will obviously continue being in charge of Fallon [McElligott], and he will have complete authority over New York," Mr. Sloves said.

Mr. Fallon, 48, said he's aware

Burger King backs low-price Buddies

New year to bring fast-food price fight

By Scott Hume

Burger King Corp. is poised to set a fast marketing pace in January, and other top fast-food chains are expected to follow suit.

The No. 2 burger chain on Jan. 2 will launch a promotion for Burger Buddies that slashes the price of two 1-ounce cheeseburgers to 29¢ with purchase of fries and a soft drink. The current suggested price is 89¢.

The move not only gives Burger King the opportunity to promote a product its competitors don't have, but it also gives the company a product priced below any discount levels offered by rivals. Burger Buddies are also targeted at both adults and children; the price of its Burger Buddies Kids Club meal will also be cut 60¢.

McDonald's Corp. intends to implement a "value pricing" menu in 1991 that could include price reductions on selected items. In many markets, McDonald's has already chopped the prices of its regular hamburger and cheeseburger to 59¢ and 69¢, respectively, about a 20¢ reduction in price.

Both chains are seeking to take sales from PepsiCo's Taco Bell chain and its Value Menu, which prices almost all items at 59¢, 79¢ or 99¢, coupled with occasional discounts of selected items to 49¢.

But the sticking point to other chains' desire to match Taco Bell's low-price strategy has been fear of depressing operators' profits with heavy discounting.

In a memo outlining the Burger Buddies promotion for operators, obtained by Advertising Age, Burger King says the promotion's prime selling point is that it "is low-priced so as to be competitive."

Burger King has covered the profitability problem by requiring purchase of any size french fries and any size soft drink—two high-profit items—to get the Burger Buddies discount.

Burger King's memo tells operators the fries/drink/Burger Buddies meal will have an average offer price of $1.71 and food cost of 66¢, yielding a 61.4% profit of $1.05 (see chart).

A 30-second network TV spot, via D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, will support the Burger Buddies promotion from Jan. 2 through Jan. 12.

The spot carries the "Some-

GM group slashes ads

Early '91 cuts may be bad sign for other units

By Raymond Serafin

General Motors Corp.'s automotive components group has suspended almost all first-quarter 1991 advertising as part of a fiscal belt-tightening that could portend cuts in spending for the company's car and truck divisions.

The automotive components group consists of nine divisions that supply parts and systems to GM and other vehicle manufacturers. The divisions combined spend an estimated $15 million on advertising annually, almost all in trade publications.

Sources within GM and in the media say the component divisions are suspending advertising through March 31, except for media buys that can't be canceled. The divisions are also cutting back on training and travel expenses during the first quarter.

"The divisions have been asked to curtail any discretionary spending during the first part of the year," a spokesman for the automotive components group confirmed. He added that current commitments would be kept.

Agencies that handle GM's vehicle divisions, which spent the lion's share of the company's $1.4 billion ad budget this year, haven't yet been given 1991 budgets.

Some GM agency executives had been told earlier that 1991 ad cuts could total as much as $200 million. But there has been discussion more recently that GM will budget only for the first quarter instead of for the entire year because of the current general economic uncertainty and the possibility of military action in the Persian Gulf in early 1991.

"Nobody is looking forward to the first quarter. Right now, the public is being very cautious about taking on long-term commitments, and GM is doing the same thing."

"We're still waiting to hear," said Richard O'Connor, chairman-ceo of Lintas:Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich., agency for Chevrolet. Mr. O'Connor said GM is "concerned about the market softening, but the corporation thinks things will turn [for the better] somewhere near midyear."

So far, agencies are making whatever buys are authorized by GM, and the company's past policy has been to honor any existing contracts even if budgets are cut.

"Nobody is looking forward to the first quarter," said one agency executive, who asked not to be identified. "Right now, the public is being very cautious about taking on long-term commitments, and GM is doing the same thing."

GM Chairman Robert Stempel said earlier this month his company is making its 1991 business plans on projections that industrywide sales of cars and trucks will be only 13.5 million units in 1991, about a 5% decline from a lackluster 1990.

"Calling the market at this point is very uncertain," said Mr. Stempel, who added there's "lots of upside potential" if the Middle East crisis is settled peacefully.

Divisions in GM's automotive components group, and their agencies, are AC Rochester, Delco Moraine NDH, Delco Products and Delco Remy, all handled by Lintas:Campbell-Ewald; Central Foundry, by Scott & Miller Group, Saginaw; Harrison Radiator, by Leo Burnett USA, Southfield; Inland Fisher Guide, no agency; Packard Electric, by Mis-

Levine suffers surprise departure of 2 top execs

By Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—Two top executives at Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver left the agency in a New Year's surprise last week, forcing the return of two semi-retired principals in an attempt to hold the shop together.

Chairman-CEO Bob Schmidt, 53, left the agency to join client Dreyfus Co. as corporate VP and president of the mutual fund company's sales, marketing and service unit.

At the same time, Creative Director Tony DeGregorio, 44, took a new job as executive creative director at Lintas:New York.

Mr. DeGregorio succeeds Frank DeVito, who continues as president of Lintas:New York but will assume creative responsibilities for key multinational accounts in North and South America.

At first glance, the departures appear to be devastating to a midsize creative shop like Levine Huntley, with billings of $280

'Value' strategy to battle recession

An Advertising Age roundup

A growing number of marketers are embracing the idea of value pricing to deal with the current recession and economic uncertainty caused by the Middle East crisis.

Categories including food, automobiles, cosmetics, liquor and hotels are exploring less expensive or "value-price" versions of established brand name products.

This strategy is in stark contrast to the last recession, in the early 1980s, when consumers were given no-name generic products, which they soon rejected.

"1991 will be the year of value pricing," said PaineWebber analyst Manny Goldman.

Extending established brands with lower-price versions gives the new products "the imprimatur of a major player" by "carrying cachet and giving consumers confidence [that the new product] is not a mongrel," said Stephen A. Greyser, professor of consumer marketing at Harvard University's Graduate School of Business.

Such "mongrels" have turned consumers away from bargain-basement and no-name brands, said Mona Doyle, a consultant at Consumer Network Inc., a consumer researcher.

Harper: ConAgra's Healthy Choice

Adman of the Year leads company's emergence as a food industry giant

By Julie Liesse

When Advertising Age chose David Mahoney, chairman of Norton Simon Inc., as its first Adman of the Year back in 1971, Mike Harper was with Pillsbury Co. buying and selling chickens.

During the 20 years that followed, Mr. Harper went on to buy companies and build ConAgra's sales from $600 million in 1974 to an estimated $23 billion this fiscal year.

NSI, meanwhile, was disappearing into Beatrice Cos., and in late 1990, the last part of a divested Beatrice—including the Hunt-Wesson brands originally owned by Mr. Mahoney's old company—became ConAgra's largest acquisition.

"That's sort of a full circle, isn't it?" Mr. Harper asks.

For building Omaha, Neb.-based ConAgra into the nation's No. 2 food company and for shepherding the dazzling success of its Healthy Choice line of foods, Charles M. "Mike" Harper, ConAgra chairman-ceo, is Advertising Age's Adman of the Year for 1990.

Although ConAgra's individual brands are recognizable to most consumers, the corporate name isn't. Even many business people are unfamiliar with it.

"You can tell that we take a little bit of pride in being 'ConAgra who?' " Mr. Harper says. "We don't put our corporate name on all our packages, because we don't think it's important. If we did it, it would be only so that we could beat our chests; it doesn't do a damn thing for the consumer."

The company's Beatrice purchase symbolically helped put an end to the deal-making, megamerger-driven '80s, when many of marketing's most precious assets—consumer

NEW YORK—The National is developing a weekly edition that could be launched as early as next month, sources at the sports daily said. The All-American edition will be published in conjunction with the daily. Spokesman Stephen Hammond said a weekly is one of several projects being considered but wouldn't release details. The National will launch a Philadelphia edition, its 11th, on Jan. 23.

Politicians sue station

ATLANTA—At least eight candidates from the 1990 election have sued a TV station here, saying they were overcharged for political spots. The suit was filed in the State Court of Fulton County by Gov.-elect Zell Miller and others against WXIA, a Gannett-owned NBC affiliate. The plaintiffs are seeking unspecified damages. The other two network affiliates here made voluntary refunds to candidates after an August Federal Communications Commission audit in five markets outside Georgia showed overcharges at 20 stations.

Proposed rate hike stuns direct mailers

By Eric Weissenstein

WASHINGTON—The Postal Rate Commission shocked third-class mailers Friday by recommending a 25% postal rate increase for most advertising mail, which could expedite their exodus to private delivery services.

Rates for second-class mail, which encompasses most newspapers and magazines, would rise 22% under the proposal; the price of a first-class stamp would jump 16% to 29¢.

The recommendations now go to the U.S. Postal Service board of governors, which can accept the proposal or return it for further review. The board's decision is expected to be announced at a meeting scheduled for Jan. 22, a postal service spokesman said.

In defending the PRC's recommendations, Chairman George Haley said the commission "strongly disagrees with—and has therefore rejected—the [postal] service's proposal to shift yet more of the burden onto first-class and away from other classes, third-class bulk mail in particular."

The increase in third-class rates, considerably more than the 17% hike urged by the postal service, left advertising mailers stunned and infuriated, especially at the prospect of a 40% hike for catalog mailers.

"As far as I can tell, and this may sound rather harsh, it smacks of a political decision, not based on the evidence," said Gene Del Polito, executive director of the Third Class Mail Association. "It's biased against third-class and shows an anti-business sentiment."

As for increasing pressure on mailers to look for alternatives to the postal service, Mr. Del Polito said the search is on.

"Without question this increases the likelihood catalogers will take into consideration much more seriously alternatives to the postal service," he said. "We must consider getting out from under the regulated monopoly."

There was some good news for third-class mailers, however. They got increased discounts for automation, including bar-coding of envelopes and fliers, and discounts for delivering mail closer to its final destination and sorted in a predetermined sequence for easier carrier delivery.

The commission also opted to go along with the controversial

Lord, HDM to merge

By Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—Lord Einstein O'Neill & Partners has agreed to merge into HDM, effectively ending the saga of the 1988 walkout that destroyed Lord, Geller, Federico, Einstein.

Details of the deal weren't disclosed, but HDM is expected to acquire the 51% of Lord Einstein not already owned by Young & Rubicam, the co-owner of HDM with Japan's Dentsu.

Chairman Dick Lord—who with Y&R's backing led the walkout of six senior Lord Geller executives after disagreeing with Martin Sorrell, chief executive of parent company WPP Group—will become chairman-ceo of HDM's combined New York and Los Angeles offices, not including HDM Direct.

The agreement in principle to merge came after the president of HDM's office here, Patrick Hillman, left to become president-chief operating officer of McCabe & Co., the new agency established by Scali, McCabe, Sloves founder Ed McCabe.

HDM Chairman Gary Burandt said the agreement was announced earlier than expected because "with ... Patrick's departure, we might as well make it public."

D. Lord

Other management positions at the combined shop haven't been determined, nor has a name been selected for the agency.

Mr. Burandt said the combined operations in New York and Los Angeles would have billings of about $222 million.

HDM had been conducting merger discussions with other New York agencies to build up critical mass but Mr. Burandt said those talks have been put on hold until Lord Einstein can be absorbed.

Paris-based Eurocom, once a partner in HDM, withdrew from the venture and bought HDM's European operations for about $60 million last month. Eurocom had complained HDM was too small in the U.S.

Lord Einstein, 49%-owned by Y&R, was successful immediately after the '88 walkout, pulling some Lord Geller accounts and winning the $25 million Saab-Scania of America account.

The agency, however, was embroiled in protracted litigation by WPP. After paying millions in legal fees, Y&R and Lord Einstein agreed in October 1989 to pay WPP $7 million. Three months later, Lord Einstein lost Saab and billings this year amounted to just over $50 million.

Lord Geller subsequently lost all its major accounts and was merged by WPP in July into what's now Brouillard/LGFE.

There were reports Mr. Lord, 65, was resisting pressure from Y&R Chairman Alex Kroll to merge the agencies (AA, Dec. 24), just as Mr. Lord had resisted Mr.

Pepsi's Pottasch to 'retire'

By Patricia Winters

The father of the Pepsi Generation is going into quasi-retirement.

Alan Pottasch, senior VP-worldwide creative at Pepsi-Cola Co., will announce during the company's annual bottlers meeting later this month that he's retiring from his duties at Pepsi North America.

However, he will remain a global consultant to Pepsi-Cola International under President Chris Sinclair, to help Pepsi breathe new life into its global advertising.

Pepsi, a minor international player compared with Coca-Cola Co., has been working to streamline its international advertising and give it a unified voice, look and sound.

Mr. Pottasch has guided Pepsi advertising for some 30 years and is widely recognized as the man behind the "Pepsi generation"—an ad slogan that since its launch in 1963 has become an international symbol of American youth and vigor.

"You're going to see that Alan [Pepsi generation] touch in a big way and in a strong way in international advertising," said Rebecca Madeira, Pepsi's public relations director.

Mr. Pottasch's day-to-day ad duties will move to David Novak, exec VP-marketing, who joined Pepsi from sister company Pizza Hut this past summer. Craig Weatherup, Pepsi North America president, is also expected to be more involved in Pepsi advertising.

Insiders said Mr. Pottasch, 63, has wanted more time for himself for a number of years but had postponed plans largely at the behest of former Pepsi CEO Roger Enrico, who moved to PepsiCo's Frito-Lay unit a few weeks ago.

Ms. Madeira said Mr. Pottasch may "entertain the idea" of taking some non-Pepsi clients. Mr. Pottasch was in the Cayman Islands and couldn't be reached for comment.

Through much of the 1980s, the team of Mr. Pottasch, Mr. Enrico and BBDO Worldwide Vice Chairman Phil Dusenberry was a seemingly invincible trio whose advertising was showered with awards. Today, only Mr. Dusenberry remains of the team, though agency executives don't expect a difficult transition, particularly since Mr. Novak worked with BBDO while at Pizza Hut. □

Recalls fair campaign group

Advertising Council President Ruth Wooden's letter (AA, Nov. 26) in response to Bob Garfield's cover story that called for PSAs to remind voters that political campaign spots are "almost never the whole truth" doesn't mention that over a span of several national elections the Ad Council carried a kind of "truth in political advertising" campaign on behalf of the now-defunct, non-partisan Fair Campaign Practices Committee.

FCPC was formed in reaction to public dismay (if not outrage) over the Richard Nixon-Helen Gahagan (Douglas) California congressional contest that launched "Tricky Dick" on his national political career.

The basis of the FCPC pitch was that voters should not cast their ballots for candidates who had not signed the Fair Campaign Practices pledge. In order to make such a program work, however, there needed to be an in-place FCPC grassroots infrastructure to ensure that every candidate got the word and took the pledge. Unfortunately, as public indignation over the Nixon-Gahagan episode died down, so did the infrastructure. By 1976, therefore, we were faced with the hypocritical spectacle of pledge-taker candidates playing dirty pool by accusing their opposites of unfair campaign practices when all that had really happened was that said opposites had never been asked by an FCPC volunteer to sign up. The program had to be withdrawn. Sic transit gloria mundi.

Overlooked in Detroit

I was very surprised when your Nov. 12 issue appeared focusing on Detroit, but with absolutely no mention of All Kids Considered, "The Family Magazine for Southeastern Michigan." Not only is our publication one of the largest parenting publications nationally, but locally we reach over 200,000 parents and educators with every issue. In October, we received the Outstanding Volunteer Award for 1990 from the Neighborhood Services Department of the city of Detroit and we are very active in the greater metropolitan Detroit area as sponsors and participants in a host of events and activities for families.

I believe that your publication was very remiss in omitting our publication from your special focus on Detroit. We are such an integral part of this community, from providing relevant information about parenting and educational resources in our area to having a major presence at several conferences and community events that focus on the family.

Getting incensed

In Jim Brady's column of Nov. 5, he quotes Bingham Marsh III describing "nuns carrying censors up the runway, incense rising." It would be amusing, certainly, to see a nun coming up a fashion-show runway with a TV network's broadcast-standards department on her back.

I bet Mr. Marsh was thinking of "censers," with an "e" instead of an "o" in the second syllable. Incense containers are "censers," not "censors."

Mistreated cat

I was horrified by the ad on the back cover of the Dec. 10 issue (cat about to be sacrificed). . . . This Penthouse ad was an unsuitable, unnecessary and offensive addition to your otherwise respectable magazine.

The cat used in the ad had matted fur and an obvious look of discomfort on its face. . . . Adult cats should not be grabbed by the scruff of the neck. Only kittens should be picked up by that method—and only by their mothers.

Too many labels

I just received your Sept. 26 (100 Leading National Advertisers) issue. I wonder how many other of your readers have had a similar problem whenever a New Yorker ad appears on the back cover.

The U.S. Postal Service apparently cannot distinguish between the mailing label you affix to your front cover, and the mailing label printed into The New Yorker ad. My copy of Ad Age took the long way to Montana, first making a stop in Bernard, ME 04612 [the address shown on the mailing label in the ad].

While I'm sure The New Yorker was pleased with their back-cover positioning, as a regular reader I was not pleased to receive such an important issue eleven weeks late. Perhaps The New Yorker and their advertising agency could be persuaded to be content with inside positions in the future.

A costly oversight

Regarding the problems facing Volvo due to their recent fraudulent advertisement: When I worked at a major consumer products company as a sales representative, we were often shown television commercials that were scheduled to run a month or more later. My question is, if, as a sales representative, I was seeing ads that far in advance (and I'm sure it's the same at Volvo), why is it that no one in management, after viewing this commercial in advance, asked, "Can our cars do that?"

At this point in time I don't see how management can blame anyone but themselves for making the ultimate mistake of assuming. It is a shame that many years of great marketing can be tarnished by such an oversight.

Ed Walsh
General manager
Main Street Marketing
Milford, Conn.

In regard to the Volvo incident, why is there so much commotion? This is not to imply that nothing was done wrong, but why is the level of indignation so high? What of other instances of fudging reality?

A current ad shows a sedan that is parachuted to the ground. I sincerely doubt that the Oldsmobile driven out of a cargo plane in the current ad would withstand a landing with just a cute scrunching of its suspension. We know that the car that landed with the smart-looking gentleman is not the one which emerges from the aircraft. If it was the same car, I believe, we would see a nice new Oldsmobile in pieces on the ground.

What of the Ford pickup commercial seen several years back which also showed a vehicle parachuted from the sky? I recall reading in the press a description of the filming preparation that detailed how the engine was removed and the heavier front axle for four-wheel drive was replaced with a plywood cutout for better balance in flight. Wood struts were fitted so as to support the normal suspension. It, too, landed with a bouncy but firm communion with Mother Earth. According to published reports, Volvo was inspired by an actual event and should have said something to that effect. I sincerely doubt that if the consumer saw "A dramatization of an actual event" we would be hearing such a ruckus.

In addition, before everyone begins throwing stones, there are many examples of similar infractions of the truth and outright deception that warrant examination by the ad industry.

A better drug message

As a recent attendee at TvB's annual conference, I viewed a videotaped report from the Partnership For a Drug Free America. In the report, Partnership Director Michael Townsend reiterated his appeal to our industry for generous PSA support and shared the good news that the campaign continued to yield significant positive results.

Earlier this year I heard Mr. Townsend speak in Seattle to a group of local broadcasters. His message then was more in-depth, but similar in tone. I vaguely recall the figure of $300-plus million worth of public service inventory as representing the broadcast industry's contribution to the cause. Research conducted by the Partnership indicated marked changes in user attitudes as a result. Mr. Townsend also offered the notion that if all the illicit drugs originating south of the border were interdicted, it would take only 90 days for those drugs to be entirely replaced with domestically-produced synthetic alternatives.

That drug use is a demand-side problem is a given. Also given is the apparent futility of the interdiction effort, despite the billions of tax dollars pushed that way. What perplexes me is why we, as broadcasters, continue to fuel the wrong message. Clearly, our $300-plus million would be better spent toward generating a citizens' action campaign to suggest that a major portion of the funds earmarked for drug-related law enforcement be reappropriated to education.

Simply stated, as goes the demand, so goes the problem. Certainly, the taxpayers have a right to know what works and what doesn't. Just as certainly, we have an obligation to tell them.

List price lunacy

Sid Berstein's Nov. 19 column was, as usual, on target. I first encountered the idiocy of pricing stickers in the automotive industry when I testified some years back at the Federal Trade Commission. At the time, guidelines were being drawn up to prohibit retailers from using a manufacturer's "list price" for savings comparisons unless the list price was "the price at which the product is ordinarily and customarily sold in a particular trading zone."

FREEZE FRAME

"We got the aspirin account! A study showed our ads give people headaches."

I pointed to the auto retailer who was actually required, by law, to post a carmaker's list price. At that time, no car was sold at sticker "list price." This was in total contradiction to the FTC position. It took a long time for me to stop laughing at the FTC retort to me, that "maybe the photo industry [then under question] should get Congress to enact a special law for them, as it did for the auto industry."

Is that the way to run a business? Much less a country?

Ad pages slump in Nov.

By Scott Donaton

"The best thing about 1990 is that it's almost over—and the best thing about 1991 is that it's going to be compared to 1990," a magazine publisher said recently.

The remark underscored the cloud of resignation that hung over publishers as they closed the worst year for ad page performance in more than a decade and prepared for a year that may be even worse.

It also sums up most magazines' ad page performance for November.

Magazine ad pages fell 5.5% to 16,917.5 in November from the same month last year, Publishers Information Bureau reported. The drop—one of the year's steepest declines—left ad pages down 4% after 11 months, at 156,463.6.

More than 60 of the 157 magazines tracked by PIB posted double-digit declines in November. The performance left 71 of the top 100 PIB magazines down in ad pages after 11 months, including eight of the top 10. Twenty-seven titles showed gains while two, Car & Driver (1,184.2 ad pages) and Four Wheeler (921.6 ad pages), stayed flat.

Ad revenues—up through most of 1990—dropped 1% in November to $695 million. For the January-November period, ad revenues totaled $6.1 billion, an increase of 1.4% over the same period in 1989.

Of the top 10 ad categories, six were soft in November: automotive, toiletries and cosmetics, business and consumer services, food, travel, and cigarettes and tobacco. Cigarettes and tobacco spending took the deepest dive, totaling $273,173,842 after 11 months, a 25% decline.

Several titles took strong hits in November.

Architectural Digest's 197.6 ad pages were down 26.1% from November 1989. Child carried 66.1 ad pages, down 39.4%; New Woman had 64.5, down 34.1%; and American Health had 30, down 51.2%.

Business Week's November pages were down 12.9% to 491, leaving the McGraw-Hill weekly with 3,927.9 ad pages after 11 months, a 12.6% drop. Fortune saw ad pages plummet 31.5% to 289.5 in November. Through November, the Time Warner title carried 3,060.2 ad pages, down 11.7%.

Forbes remained the only one of the top 3 business magazines on the plus side. Ad pages climbed 7.2% in November to 470.8 and totaled 3,654 year-to-date, a 1.4% gain.

Vogue led all monthlies after 11 months with 2,750 ad pages, down 10.6%. It was followed by the North American edition of The Economist, with 2,452.9 ad pages, up 13.1%. Vogue rival Elle stayed virtually flat with 2,100.7 ad pages, up 0.4%.

Among other top monthlies, Cosmopolitan's 1,999.8 ad pages for January-November represented an 8.5% decline from the same period last year. Entrepreneur carried 1,854 ad pages, up 13.2%.

GQ's 1,824.3 ad pages were down 9.8%. Glamour, with 1,718.4 ad pages, was off 5.6%. Architectural Digest saw its pages fall 3.4% to 1,696.3.

Good Housekeeping, the top women's service magazine in 1990 and the only one showing ad page gains, was up 3.2% to 1,577.46. It was followed closely by Family Circle with 1,545 ad pages, an 18.6% decline. Ladies' Home Journal was third in the field with 1,408 ad pages, down 4.2%.

Despite the downfall, a number of publishers continued to post strong gains.

Financial World carried 917.9 ad pages, up 28.7%. Parenting's 741.1 ad pages were up 16.7%; The Atlantic had 638.7, up 13.3%; Decorating Remodeling had 360.5, up 75.9%; and Cooking Light had 346.3, up 11.2%. □

Consumer Linage for November won't appear; yearend figures will be published later this month.

Program and business-side developments in TV and radio.

Promoting horror. NBC is in the midst of what the network believes is an unprecedented four-week promotional blitz for a single new series: the revival of the gothic horror show "Dark Shadows." The series premieres as a four-hour miniseries Jan. 13 and 14 before joining the Friday schedule at 9 p.m. (ET) Jan. 18. In addition to on-air spots and cable TV and print, the network is planning a "Dark Shadows" radio contest sponsored by one of the show's chief sponsors, Domino's Pizza; a deal with Preview Tech to show two-minute trailers of "Dark Shadows" in more than 250 Circuit City and Highland electronics stores; and promotional spots telecast near concession stands in more than 200 United Artists Entertainment Co. movie theaters.

Daytime dropouts. NBC, in an attempt to shore up its flagging daytime schedule, will drop one hour of its network daytime programming this fall, returning the time to its local station affiliates. NBC now programs 5½ hours each weekday and ranks third in the season-to-date network daytime ratings race with an average 3.1 rating and 12 share. CBS is first with a 5.5 rating/22 share, followed by ABC's 4.6/18. □

Energizer hops onto top 10

By Kate Fitzgerald

Eveready Battery Co.'s Energizer bunny won by more than a hare when it hopped onto the top 10 list of best-recalled ads for the first time.

The high-profile pink bunny marched onto the scene in 1989, interrupting 15-second parody TV spots, but top-of-mind consumer recall of the ads has seemed to lag behind the bunny's fame.

In November, Energizer finally landed among the 10 best-recalled ads, tying with Toyota for the No. 7 spot in Advertising Age's monthly AdWatch survey of ad awarene..s.

The bunny's success was powered by a $30 million fourth-quarter TV and print campaign from Chiat/Day/Mojo, Venice, Calif., which featured new executions of interrupted parody spots.

A blitz of last-minute TV spots for the Nov. 6 elections drove political ads into first place in November, after the category placed second in October.

Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser was No. 2 in the latest survey, moving up three notches and improving its awareness for the second consecutive month. Ford placed third, while Chevrolet tied for the No. 4 slot with general automobile ads.

AT&T moved up the ranks of the top 10 in November to sixth, from eighth place in October, while McDonald's tumbled from No. 1 in October to ninth place in November. Coca-Cola placed No. 10.

The shake-up in the top 10 also included the disappearance of Nike, which appeared on the list for eight consecutive months since last March.

AdWatch is a joint project of Ad Age and the Gallup Organization. Advertising awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample to name the first advertising that comes to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days. In November, 1,000 adults were polled by phone. The survey's margin of error is plus or minus 3.1%. □

Yearn-to-Learn ad entries due

NEW YORK—Sell a teen-ager something money can't buy: an education.

That's the challenge posed by the third annual Yearn-to-Learn Challenge. Sponsored by Crain Communications Inc.'s Advertising Age and Scholastic Inc., the competition is designed to enlist advertising and marketing talent in the effort to counter the nation's 30% high school dropout rate.

Entrants in the Challenge create ads encouraging teen-agers to complete their high school education. Five winning ads will be selected to appear during the 1991-92 school year in the Scholastic Teen Network of magazines: Junior Scholastic, Scholastic Choices, Scholastic Update, Scholastic Voice and Science World. These publications reach 11 million junior and senior high school students nationwide.

The winning ads will also appear in Advertising Age. The overall winner will be announced this spring as part of Ad Age's annual awards reception in Chicago. Ten certificates of merit will also be awarded.

Entries will be judged by a panel of educators, representatives of the advertising and marketing communities, and high school students.

"We're proud to once again provide the vehicle that brings these ads from agency drawing boards to the desks of the nation's junior and senior high school students," said Michele S. Magazine, senior VP, Scholastic Inc. Magazine Group.

Added Rance Crain, CCI president and editor in chief of Ad Age: "Our support of Yearn-to-Learn is stronger than ever. We continue to look upon these ads, directed to teen-age students, as imperatives in the ongoing effort to keep them in school. We must convince them that education is their ticket to a productive, good life in our society."

The creative work for the Yearn-to-Learn Challenge brochure and a page ad in Ad Age was donated by Cadwell Davis Partners, New York. Bradley Printing Co., Chicago, donated brochure printing services.

Deadline for Yearn-to-Learn Challenge entries is March 6. Entries may be in b&w or color and must be suitable for classroom use.

Entry kits are available from Stephanie Feuer, public relations manager, Scholastic Inc., 730 Broadway, 10003. Phone: (212) 505-3419. □

Eurocom bares logic behind its nude ad

By Bruce Crumley

A new, racy Eurocom Advertising print ad touting the agency's size is causing a big reaction, particularly in the U.S.

The ad—showing a nude woman on her stomach with her upper body propped up by her elbows—was captioned: "Can an advertising network founded in France be successful worldwide?"

The only other copy: "Eurocom Advertising. No. 1 network in Europe and No. 9 in the world," a reference to Eurocom's pullout from HDM and its purchase of the HDM network's European offices (AA, Dec. 17).

While some Eurocom people consider the ad too racy, the decision to use nudity had both humorous and very serious designs, Eurocom executives said.

The serious side, said a Eurocom spokeswoman, was to get the message across loudly and quickly, without having to rely solely on information that would make the ad too dry (such as the network being Europe's largest and ninth in the world).

In this case, she said, getting attention took priority over questions of creativity.

The partly humorous side, said Eurocom Chairman Alain de Pouzilhac, was to assert what many foreigners find as French advertising's typical over-reliance on flesh.

"A lot of people fault French advertising for this [nudity]," he said. "And this is part of the reason for using this girl. We are asking if this French [-founded] network can work elsewhere. And our answer is yes. I think people will look at this ad and remember it."

The ad ran in the French press as well as marketing publications including Advertising Age.

To further focus on the fact that irony has a place in advertising, the ad could have also mentioned that the model baring it all for the French-founded network happens to be an American. □

Gulf war could delay Super Bowl

War anxiety grows; marketers regroup

By Scott Donaton and Wayne Walley

The National Football League is considering the postponement of Super Bowl XXV, the year's largest and most visible advertising vehicle, if war breaks out in the Persian Gulf.

An NFL spokesman said league executives have discussed what would be an "appropriate response" if the Gulf crisis escalates into armed conflict.

Greg Aiello, NFL director of communications, wouldn't discuss specific options but acknowledged that the Super Bowl could be postponed in the event of war.

"We are considering everything, and it depends on the circumstances," he said. "At this time, we really don't know what might happen."

The Jan. 27 game in Tampa, Fla., is to be telecast on ABC. ABC executives couldn't be reached for comment.

Historically, sports and entertainment events have continued through war and have been considered vital, Mr. Aiello said.

"Sports in the past have been good for the morale of troops," he said. "It shows things are normal back home, and they like to know what their team is doing."

Several Super Bowl advertisers said they had [illegible]

Carmakers set to shift

Oil fears propel new selling strategies

By Raymond Serafin

Carmakers are changing tactics to cope with hard times that could only worsen with oil shortages accompanying a Persian Gulf war.

The glitz of the new year's first two major auto shows in Los Angeles and Detroit couldn't hide the underlying pessimism that new car and truck sales will remain weak at least until spring.

A late-year 1990 slump caused by the worsening economy dragged down total new car and light-truck sales; industry sales fell 4.8% to 13.8 million units last year.

Auto marketers now are trying to stay flexible in case a war changes the availability and price of oil.

"There's a lot of 'what ifs' going on right now," said Joseph Hendrix, general marketing manager of General Motors Corp.'s Pontiac division. "There's a big fork in the road coming up on the 15th of January."

Said Dannielle Colliver, advertising manager-cars for GM's Chevrolet division: "We're poised to shift [media] scheduling and funding to different products as may be appropriate."

As an example, "If the Middle East situation would affect the sale of large cars, you could see our funding moving to some of the intermediate

Several airlines face crash dive

By Jennifer Lawrence

If war breaks out, U.S. airlines could face an unprecedented economic crisis sure to change the profile of the air transportation industry.

Carriers are already being squeezed by higher jet fuel prices, a slowdown in demand and overcapacity. And the airline picture could become even bleaker—depending on the outcome of the Iraq conflict.

A war is virtually certain to boost fuel costs to possibly record levels. The devastation to airlines will depend on how long a conflict lasts.

The crisis has already claimed two airline victims.

CPC gets RICO win

PHILADELPHIA—The advertising industry won another round last week when a false-advertising suit filed here under the Racketeer Influenced & Corrupt Organizations Act wasn't allowed to proceed against CPC International.

At issue were ads for Mazola oil and margarine from Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York. Attorneys for CPC said the ruling, following a similar decision in a suit against Nutri/Systems diet programs, might spell the end of all RICO-based false-advertising suits. By refusing to grant class action status to the suit, U.S. District Judge Louis Bechtle effectively eliminated the financial incentive for pursuing the case against CPC. The attorneys also noted Judge Bechtle is the district's chief judge, so his ruling is likely to be followed by other judges in similar suits.

AD REVIEW

Famous faces put new fizz in familiar idea for A&W soda

(Rating: ★ ★ ★ ½)

By Bob Garfield

Garfield

It was a conceptual twist with every chance to fail. Likely to fail. Destined to fail.

A&W Brands' new TV commercials, the company announced, would be "humorous" spots-within-spots about the making of TV commercials. What a dramatic thought—the drama being to see what insipid twist on a bankrupt old idea Della Femina, McNamee, New York, would trot out.

Pirandellian self-consciousness in a TV commercial is a concept so fresh that it had never been done before, except by every car dealer and furniture store in the Western Hemisphere. Among others. In all of recorded history, the joke has worked about twice.

Alka-Seltzer's classic "Speecy Spicy Meatballs" in the '60s established the standard for the genre. Only lately has the Energizer bunny expanded the frontier. In the interim, most everything else has been dreadful. Self-consciousness is a poor substitute for substance. If you have nothing important to say and no fetching way to say it, better to hire a blimp with Your Logo Here.

So let's just say that the A&W announcement wasn't what you'd call a confidence builder. Complicating matters, the declared intention to use familiar figures from previous TV commercial campaigns suggested a clumsy use of borrowed interest in the bargain. This is a campaign, not to put too fine a point on it, that promised to stink.

It doesn't.

These are hilarious, ingenious, eye-catching ads that will succeed in doing precisely what they aim to do, which is leverage about a $9 media budget through other advertisers' hundreds of millions of dollars investment in ad-character development.

All three spots are wonderful, but the best is called "Fingers," which opens on the set of a commercial shoot with the director giving the talent instructions on what to say. The shot is a close-up of A&W diet root beer and diet cream soda cans, plus two frothy mugs.

"Pick up the glass," the off-camera director tells his actress, "and say, 'When I want a diet soft drink, nothing beats the smooth, light vanilla taste of A&W Diet Cream Soda and rich, creamy Diet A&W Root Beer with 100% NutraSweet.' "

"Got it," the actress says, also off-camera.

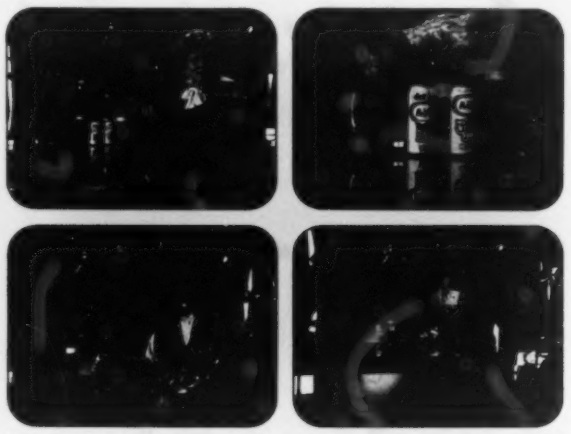
"Good," says the director. "And [the slate is clapped to mark Take 1]. . . action!" But the actress doesn't deliver her line; she dips her hand into the root beer.

"Cut!" says the director. "Just pick it up. Let's try again. [Slate, Take 2.] Action!" But this time she dips her hand into the cream soda.

"No, no. Just pick it up. [Take 3.] Action!" Again, into the root beer.

"No, no, no, no. Cut!" (Take 4, cream soda.) "No, no, no, no." (Take 15, cream soda.)

And so on, bad take after bad take. Finally, the exasperated director squeaks, "No! Cut! Why do you keep doing that?" At this point, the camera pulls back to reveal that the actress is Jan Miner, whom we know as Madge the Manicurist from 25 years of Palmolive dishwashing liquid commercials. She's in her blue manicuring smock, and she seems puzzled, too.



Madge the Manicurist's new finger fetish is a mugful of A&W root beer, while Mr. Whipple enjoys squeezing aluminum. Mr. T also stars in this ingenious effort.

"I have no idea," she says.

But we do, of course, because we've had to stomach Madge and her Palmolive-soaked clients since about the Gulf of Tonkin incident, and if we had the choice of never having seen her or never having pressed the Vietnam War, we'd have some serious soul-searching to do.

Thus the cunning of the spot, and of the other spots featuring Dick Wilson (Mr. Whipple) and Mr. T (Mr. T). All create powerful, instant bursts of recognition and amusement—with the product (credit art director Marian Godwin) at center stage 100% of the time. Maybe A&W can buy only $9 worth of time, but Palmolive and Charmin and the A-Team, in effect, have contributed a half-billion dollars in pre-publicity. And because the editing (Phil Messina), direction (Mark Chiat) and copy (David Leinwohl) are so punchy, economical and deftly timed, the viewer will gladly wait 30 seconds for the payoff, which these days is half the battle.

Still, in a sense, the campaign does achieve its destiny. Madge, Whipple and T have been unfailingly annoying me for decades. This time, they failed. □ to anything until we see the recommendations of the agencies," he said.

Plans for a media consolidation were under way months before Nestle in November announced it was setting up the holding company for Carnation, Nestle Foods Corp., Stouffer Foods Corp., Nestle/Hills Coffee Co. and other, smaller food units (AA, Nov. 19).

Nestle USA, with sales of more than $7 billion, covers the biggest single market for the $30 billion-plus Swiss giant, the world's biggest food marketer.

Nestle USA companies have already consolidated parts of their media work in recent years.

Carnation uses Lintas New York for all network TV buys and the Bloom Agency, Dallas, for spot TV buys. But those agencies' connections were weakened last year when Carnation dropped them as creative agencies and reassigned its brands.

Lintas since last spring has also handled Nestle Foods' daytime network TV buying. Nestle Foods and Carnation have channeled print buying through Della Femina, McNamee, Pittsburgh, for about three years, Mr. McMennamin said.

Nestle USA's major agencies are New York shops McCann-Erickson Worldwide; Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor; and J. Walter Thompson USA; as well as Dailey & Associates, Los Angeles, and Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago.

Even with the consolidation, it's possible some buying, such as spending by a smaller unit, may not be consolidated, Mr. McMennamin said.

Mr. Crull said few creative assignment shifts are likely in the wake of Nestle USA's Jan. 1 start-up.

The creative agencies, which would also handle media planning, will be paid a commission based on the amount of media behind their brands, Nestle USA said; agencies of record for media placement will be paid on a fee basis.

Even with the change, Nestle USA will play no direct role in media buying. Each unit will deal independently with the agencies handling the consolidated media buying, Mr. McMennamin said.

"We have to assure the operational companies get proper response, timeliness, level of detail, etc. from the buying agency," he said. "A centralized control would not do the process justice. . . . We strongly believe in the operating units, so we want to give them the responsibility."

Nor will Nestle USA play a direct role in designing agency incentive compensation programs, long championed by its parent.

Each operating unit will decide whether and how to use incentives, said Mr. McMennamin, who earlier implemented an incentive program at Carnation.

"I will say without reservation that incentives work very well with advertising agencies, like they work very well with anybody else," Mr. Crull said. "The agency community overall may not have liked it when we announced it, but it's been successful."

And Mr. McMennamin said, "The thing that's similar [among all units] is that they do believe in incentivizing their agencies." □ ber of different languages, the other commercials in the campaign are being done without spoken language.

Title cards identifying Nike and promoting the Air 180's worldwide availability will be used, translated into various languages. Ads will use the company's "Just do it" theme of the past three years.

Tokyo-based Dentsu will handle Asian media buying and planning for Nike and CIA International, London, is doing European media planning and placement. SFM Media, New York, buys media for Nike in the U.S.

A global product launch "is a great drill for any company . . . as you move toward a global economy," Mr. Bedbury said.

Introducing the Air 180 globally instead of launching it in the U.S. and rolling it to other parts of the world during a longer period of time will give Nike more time to build sales before rivals copy the product, said John Horan, editor of Sporting Goods Intelligence, an industry newsletter.

Observers say the real potential for growth for Nike, which leads the $5.55 billion U.S. branded athletic shoe market with a 28.4% share, is overseas.

"I don't think people realize what [big business] they're going to do in Europe in the next three years," Mr. Horan said.

Nike won't continue to get the U.S. growth rate it's had in the past, he said. The U.S. market's growth was 20% to 25% annually in the mid-1980s, but is expected to slow to 6% to 7% this year, Mr. Horan said. □

An Advertising Age roundup

Marketers are distancing their brands from the Persian Gulf crisis as quickly as they can—even if it means not advertising the brands at all.

Some are pulling spots and abandoning ad schedules entirely.

GULF CRISIS

United Airlines will review its ad plans on Jan. 23, having told agency Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, to pull virtually all its advertising Jan. 16, including ads slated for both of yesterday's National Football League championship games on CBS and NBC.

"As people sit and watch all this war news, no one is interested in making thoughtful consideration of an airline purchase," said John Ruhaak, United VP-advertising. "Advertising has lost its effectiveness [temporarily]."

The slew of advertisers that won't air spots during news coverage of the war include such leading national advertisers as Procter & Gamble Co.; Sears, Roebuck & Co.; Pepsi-Cola Co.; McDonald's Corp.; and Pizza Hut.

The list also includes Toyota Motor Sales USA, American Isuzu Motors, Miller Brewing Co., Eastman Kodak Co., Ford Motor Co., Hershey Foods Corp., AT&T Co. and American Express Co.

Most of the marketers will continue to run advertising during regularly scheduled programming, however.

Advertisers said they would work with the networks to come up with make-goods for ads pulled for commercial-free war

War bleeds nets of millions a day

By Wayne Walley

The Persian Gulf War has thrown TV ad schedules into chaos and is taking a financial toll, particularly on the Big 3 networks.

The cost of the conflict to networks in lost ad revenues, and war coverage expenses could mount to tens, or even hundreds, of millions of dollars if round-the-clock coverage of the conflict is needed for an extended period.

Estimates of ad revenue losses ranged from $1 million to $3 million per day per network.

ABC, CBS and NBC last week began asking whether advertisers would consider running spots in special war coverage or agree to re-express the money slated for regular programming at a later time.

Ironically, the lost inventory could actually benefit the networks by tightening what's been a soft first-quarter scatter market.

"Overall this might help the networks," said Louis Schultz, exec VP-director of media services for Lintas:USA, New York. "The pre-emptions give much attention to network news. And the make-goods will use up inventory that would have been difficult to sell in a soft marketplace."

"When you take $9 million a day out [of the networks], yes, that's going to have an impact on inventory. . . . A soft market has been artificially tightened by the shifting of spots," said Mike White, exec VP-director of the media department at DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago.

ABC, CBS and NBC also asked advertisers last week to delay de-

NEW YORK—Omnicom Group plans to buy a minority stake in Abbott Mead Vickers, London, a move that could speed WPP Group's spinoff of a majority stake in Scali, McCabe, Sloves.

Omnicom is expected to announce early this week that it will buy the 22% stake in Abbott now held by Scali for a price estimated at slightly more than $10 million. Omnicom would then merge its small London office of BBDO Worldwide into Abbott. BBDO and Abbott have few client conflicts.

Abbott last week acknowledged negotiations with Omnicom that "might result in a closer relationship." Deputy Chairman Adrian Vickers would say only that any deal wouldn't cause a change in the agency's management.

"If it's good for my partners [at Abbott], I would entertain selling it," said Marvin Sloves, chairman-ceo of Scali. "Obviously, I can't sell any asset without [WPP Chief Executive Martin Sorrell's] approval. I have not talked to Omnicom" directly about such a sale, Mr. Sloves added, indicating that the talks were taking place with WPP, which owns 80% of Scali and would get that percentage of the sale's proceeds.

Sources say cash from a sale would help ease WPP's financial pressures and spur progress on Scali's buyback from WPP. Removing the Abbott holdings would lessen Scali's sale price.

Mr. Sloves minimized the strategic importance of Abbott to Scali's other offices but stressed asset sales weren't a condition for the buyback.

"We've not abandoned the buyback, and we're not against another party coming in if they have money," he said. "We're open to every option," including a self-financed buyback, "and we're continuing conversations with a number of outside people."

WPP declined to comment on Abbott, and officials at Omnicom and BBDO didn't return calls.

For Omnicom, the move would cap a long search for an agency to bolster BBDO's London operation, which has been plagued by rapid management turnover and an inability to win accounts.

BBDO ranks just 42nd in the U.K. with 1989 gross income of $7.9 million. Abbott is more than three times larger, ranking 16th with 1989 gross income of $25.8 million.

"One of [Omnicom's] imperatives for a while has been to enhance BBDO's competitive position in the U.K. market," said Greg Ostroff, analyst at Goldman, Sachs & Co.

Omnicom acquired London agency Boase Massimi Pollitt in 1989 to revive BBDO, but BMP instead insisted on merging with Omnicom's other agency, DDB Needham Worldwide. The operation is now known as BMP DDB Needham Worldwide. □

Sorrell wants deep cuts at O&M, JWT

By Gary Levin

WPP Group Chief Executive Martin Sorrell is seeking to cut costs quickly by pressuring his agency units to reduce their work forces, possibly by as much as 5% worldwide.

Mr. Sorrell has ordered top executives at Ogilvy & Mather and J. Walter Thompson Co. to list employees who can be dismissed without major impact on client businesses, say sources familiar with his plans.

Hundreds of the agencies' estimated 15,000 staffers are expected to be affected, and Hill & Knowlton also may be involved.

Savings from the anticipated layoffs are said to be built into first-quarter budgets and must be completed by March 31 to stick to budgets and satisfy WPP's lenders.

U.K. accounting rules allow the costs associated with layoffs, including severance payments, to be taken before they're actually made.

Those targeted are said to include regional directors in the administrative, account management and financial areas whose jobs are duplicated within the agencies or at WPP itself.

Most of the layoffs are likely to occur outside the U.S., where the units have been more vigilant in belt tightening, the sources say.

Burt Manning, chairman-ceo of J. Walter Thompson Co., and Graham Phillips, chairman-ceo of Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide, didn't return calls seeking comment, and it was unclear to what extent the two executives would resist the dismissals.

Salaries alone now account for nearly half of WPP's total operating costs of $1.8 billion.

The cuts are consistent with WPP's financial problems and stern warnings from Mr. Sorrell in letters sent late last year to operating unit chiefs as they prepared their 1991 budgets.

WPP has told analysts its 1990 pretax profits would be 18% less than originally anticipated due to unforeseen weaknesses in fourth-quarter revenues. Mr. Sorrell wrote that the first half of 1991 would continue to be "extremely difficult" for WPP.

"In these circumstances and bearing our overall position in mind, it is essential that all costs are conservatively budgeted and that staff costs in particular are held down or reduced," he wrote. "There still are significant inefficiencies, duplication of costs, unnecessary levels of management, and unnecessary overheads and coordinating units."

"There still are significant inefficiencies, duplication of costs, unnecessary levels of management, and unnecessary overheads and coordinating units."

For example, JWT USA's staff includes a chairman, a vice chairman, a president, a ceo and a North American ceo.

O&M has already begun removing management layers, particularly in New York, but more steps will be needed. The agency has been unsuccessful at winning new business and hasn't been able to lease out excess office space.

"I expect there to be some significant reductions in overhead coming in the next few months as part of the plan to recapitalize and downsize in a recession," said Greg Ostroff, analyst at Goldman, Sachs & Co.

"The situation at yearend [1990] was about in line with what they thought it would be in November," when WPP announced its lower profit expectation, said James Dougherty, analyst at County NatWest Securities USA.

But holders of WPP's $620 million in debt are forcing Mr. Sorrell's hand in cost cutting and eliminating the company's common dividend, a move Mr. Sorrell is said to have resisted.

"At the moment, WPP feels its main constituency is the banks, not the shareholders," Mr. Dougherty said.

Already, Mr. Sorrell has reduced his corporate staff, laying off two U.S. executives charged with cross-selling WPP services to clients.

"I think it was necessary and correct for WPP corporate, through its own [cost cutting] actions, to signal the type of cost savings and retrenchment it wished to see from its operating units," said John Quelch, a WPP director and professor at Harvard University's Graduate School of Business Administration.

"We're not asking the operating units to do any more or less than WPP corporate has done in the last month in terms of evaluating costs and overhead," Mr. Quelch said. "The pressures for improved productivity that WPP is requiring of the operating units will actually serve, in my opinion, to make the operating units stronger in the long term and better able themselves to successfully negotiate the uncertain economic conditions that exist in 1991." □

Agency staffing keeps even keel in '90

By Gary Levin

Staffing levels for the top 10 U.S. agency employers held steady at yearend even as the ad business contracted sharply in the latter half of 1990.

An Advertising Age survey of the 10 agencies with the largest U.S. staffs showed total employment was up just 0.2% to 21,476 from April levels, despite a difficult fourth quarter and a bleak outlook for at least the next several months.

Last April, the Ad Age survey showed total employment was 21,438, a 0.4% decline from the previous October. The figures don't represent total U.S. ad agency employment, which by most accounts has been on a steady decline for the past few years.

An annual survey by the American Association of Advertising Agencies of its members, for example, reveals there were 69,676 employees at 716 member agencies in 1985, but only 69,014 employees, for a 1% decline, at 750 member agencies in 1989, the most recent year for which figures are available.

"The business itself has gone up dramatically, but [employment levels] have been flat," said Harry Paster, exec VP at the Four A's.

"The trend is to let people go and hold off on hiring," he said, adding that large agencies are often more insulated from cyclical downturns.

Predictably, big agencies that added substantial business also fattened their payrolls, while those on the losing end continued to pare staffs.

"No matter what [the economy is doing], we've got a lot of work to do. Our workload has gone up, not down."

Leo Burnett Co., Chicago, was the biggest gainer, with staff levels rising to 2,270, a 4.4% hike compared with April levels. New York-based Ogilvy & Mather had the largest employee decline, dropping 5% to 1,991.

"We're right about where we thought we'd be" with personnel, said Jack Kraft, vice chairman-administration and finance at Burnett. "We've been adding to our sales promotion and direct marketing staffs, that's part of it. But no matter what [the economy is doing], we've got a lot of work to do. Our workload has gone up, not down."

O&M declined to comment on its past and future work-force reductions, which have stemmed from account losses and heightened financial pressure from its owner, WPP Group, London.

But J. Walter Thompson Co., New York, another WPP unit, said that while it too has cut staff, it expects no further significant retrenchment, despite rumors to the contrary.

"1990 was a year of adjustment," said Ronald Burns, ceo of JWT North America. "I think we've been prudent, planned conservatively, trimmed back and adjusted for the times."

Since April, JWT has trimmed its U.S. staff of 2,564 by 49 people, a 1.9% drop, including several at its recruitment advertising unit, itself plagued by a bleak job outlook.

"We're going into 1991 in pretty good shape," Mr. Burns said. "I don't anticipate any significant changes in U.S. employees in the coming year."

But others see continued retrenchment.

"The downsizing is going to continue to be a fact of life in the agency business," said John J. Dooner Jr., president of McCann-Erickson North America.

"1991 is not going to be a picnic" for agencies, Mr. Dooner said, adding that he's going to continue to "run a tight ship."

Mr. Dooner believes revenue from last year's new-business wins will forestall any layoffs until the economy picks up in the second half or 1992. □

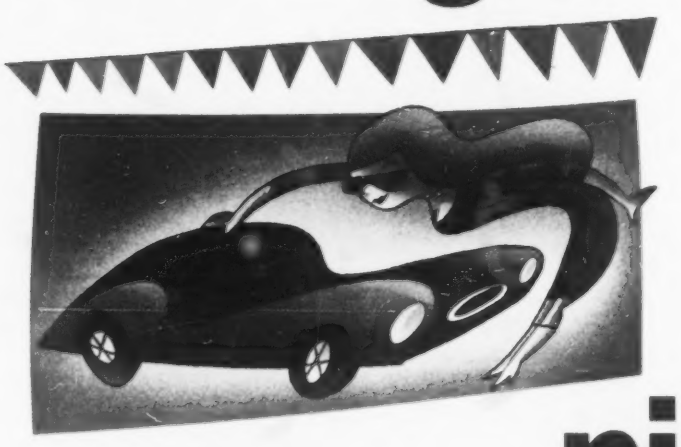
Finding the right niche



'The customer's always right'

By Raymond Serafin

In the early 1920s, some dealers asked Henry Ford if he would vary the color of the Model T, by far the biggest-selling car of its time.

"You can have them any color you want, boys, as long as they're black," Mr. Ford replied.

"That's a viable concept only if you don't know what other colors consumers want," says Bill Vanderbok, director of automotive research at Plog Research, today.

The growth of consumer information in the last 15 years allows better customer targeting, says Mr. Vanderbok, which means "now there's a lot less risk in niche marketing."

If information made niche marketing possible, competition has forced the issue.

The number of competitors keeps growing, and they're fighting for shares of a smaller market. Auto industry sales have been shrinking from about 15.8 million cars and trucks in 1988 to 14.8 million in 1989 and about 14.2 million in 1990.

Increasingly, the winners are companies that do the best job of using niche marketing to personalize product design, address individual needs and win the loyalties of customers.

The emphasis on more effectively serving niches won't abate as economic uncertainty has automakers bracing for a decline in 1991. General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. both plan for industrywide sales of only 13.5 million.

With more than 600 models competing for fewer buyers, "it's very tough for any specific nameplate or brand to get people's attention and consideration," says Shirley Young, VP-consumer market development for General Motors.

Ralph Sarotte, market plans manager for Chrysler Corp.'s Dodge division, says the need to stand out is one reason to develop niche products.

"There used to be only 15 nameplates, and if you were an established brand you could expect a reasonable segment of the market," he says. "Now you have to do something attention-getting to get people to shop you."

Dodge is using low-volume niche products to shape an image for affordable performance, starting with two 1991 models, the Stealth sports car and the Spirit R/T sedan. On deck is the limited-production Viper, a two-seat sports car, due out in the 1992 model year.

In addition to using niche strategies in product development, automakers are focusing on everything from media and creative decisions to owner-loyalty programs.

"If a customer buys a car every five years, and there are 2½ cars per household, you could be talking about $400,000 as the value of that customer over a lifetime," says Ms. Young.

Michael Grimaldi, Oldsmobile's general marketing manager, says the GM division is "determined to become [a] leader in customer satisfaction and repurchase loyalty" through its "Oldsmobile Edge" package of guaranteed satisfaction, roadside assistance and bumper-to-bumper warranty.

"We will place as much emphasis in our advertising on the Edge as on any of our products," Mr. Grimaldi says.

The newest automotive player, GM's Saturn Corp., evaluated more than 300 publications before settling on 30 magazines as part of a strategy to reach an import-owning audience.

Saturn is trying specifically to reach young, educated adults who "are information oriented, who list reliability and durability as the No. 1 reasons for buying a car, and who are somewhat leading edge in that they'll try something new," says Luana Floccuzio, Saturn's advertising manager-consumer marketing.

Saturn chose some non-traditional publications such as Atlantic, Harper's and Wigwag because "we wanted publications that people spent some time with," she says.

Henry Ford might have been surprised at the lengths his company now goes to actively seek consumer input.

Consultancies conduct "a couple thousand" focus groups a year for Ford to get reactions to products, dealership experiences and advertising, says Toby Hynes, director of marketing research for Ford's North American automotive operations.

The focus groups are used "all the way through the development cycle" of a product, Mr. Hynes says.

The 1920s disdain for customer opinion has turned into a '90s desire to target the customer's every need.

"There's a gap between what a customer wants and what management thinks the customer wants," Mr. Hynes says. "And what we're trying to do is close that gap." □

Full-size pickup battle is drawing imports' interest

By Michelle Krebs

There may be a new challenger in the boxing match between Chevy and Ford pickup trucks.

General Motors Corp.'s Chevrolet Motor Division and Ford Motor Co. have been jabbing at each other continuously in ads for their full-size pickup trucks since 1987, but Toyota Motor Sales USA is rumored to be jumping into the ring by the mid-1990s. This would mark the first import to challenge the domestics in that niche.

The imports have made big inroads in other segments, but the domestic automakers say they're ready to take on all comers.

"By the time a Toyota, Isuzu, Nissan or any import manufacturer is ready to compete in the full-size arena, we'll be even stronger from a selection, mix and quality perspective than we are today," says Frank Raine, Chevrolet marketing manager-trucks.

Toyota recently announced plans to build a second assembly plant in Georgetown, Ky., where it now builds the midsize Camry. Toyota executives say the plant will be used to build more Camry models.

But some industry observers believe the Camry is a smokescreen, and the plant will be used to build full-size pickup trucks or a combination of Camrys and pickups. If so, Toyota could be selling full-size pickups in the U.S. by 1994.

Toyota is keeping a tight lock on its plans for this segment –one of the industry's brightest for most of the 1980s until sales recently fell off dramatically.

"We continually reassess those segments in which we aren't represented. But we presently have no plans to produce a full-size pickup truck," says John McCandless, Toyota's Midwest regional PR manager.

Nevertheless, industry observers believe a full-size truck makes sense in Toyota's product line.

Toyota will have to break into new niches to fulfill its lofty sales goals: 1.5 million vehicles in the U.S. by 1995 and 2 million by 2000, when it hopes to surpass Ford. It now sells more than 1 million vehicles in the U.S. annually.

Full-size trucks would be a logical move for Toyota, says Mr. Raine. He thinks Toyota will proceed with the launch because it wants to be a full-line maker.

Like Japanese manufacturers American Isuzu Motors, Mazda Motors of America, Mitsubishi Motor Sales of America and Nissan Motor Corp. USA, Toyota already has penetrated the small pickup truck market. It led other imports in small-truck sales for the first 11 months of 1990; total small-truck sales should be just less than 300,000.

Toyota appears to be the import most seriously looking at the full-size market.

"Obviously with a newcomer like Toyota, we're concerned," says Michael Zevalkink, truck marketing plans manager, Ford division. "But we'll be fully competitive."

He says Ford's and other full-size truck makers' head start in the niche allows them to benefit from the segment's high owner loyalty. And full-size buyers tend to be from the South and Midwest, where penetration by imports hasn't been as high as on the East and West Coasts.

Ford truck ads take a heavy costs savings position.

"This is an area where we have been for so long, as opposed to smaller car and smaller truck [markets]," says Mr. Zevalkink.

Mr. Raine agrees. "Ten to 15 years ago, when imports made inroads with small cars, we were selling Vegas and Chevettes and trying to compete with the progressively improved quality of the Japanese models," he says. "We weren't very well positioned to defend our turf."

He contends that's not the case in full-size trucks, where product lines will be improved, revamped and expanded by the time Toyota's trucks hit the streets.

Chrysler Corp. also is confident, planning to introduce its first new generation of full-size trucks in 25 years by 1994. With the introduction, the company expects its full-size truck sales to double from its current 85,000 annually. The not-yet-named newcomers may replace the Ram trucks.

Chris Cedergren, director-competitive assessment, J.D. Power & Associates, isn't sure Toyota will jump into the segment.

"It remains to be seen if Toyota will go ahead with the program," he says.

Toyota may wait for the federal government to set standards for fuel economy on trucks. More stringent standards would make the niche less attractive.

Industry sources believe Toyota is considering a couple of design options: a V-8-powered truck styled similarly to current domestic makes, or a smaller, still-powerful engine that would allow the vehicle's design to differ from domestic offerings.

If Toyota doesn't build a full-size truck at the Kentucky plant, Mr. Cedergren predicts it will wait until after 1996 and build the truck at the joint-venture plant with General Motors in Fremont, Calif. Toyota is expected to assume full control of the plant when the companies' joint-venture agreement expires in 1996.

Mr. Cedergren says Toyota may hold off on the trucks and concentrate on the car market.

"Toyota's primary mission is to make sure it is No. 1 in car sales," says Mr. Cedergren. "If you walk the halls of Toyota, the common theme there is to blow Honda away by 1995."

Honda sells only cars and outsold Toyota in the 1990 model year, which ended Sept. 30. Honda sold 849,549 cars in the U.S. to Toyota's 765,241, according to Automotive News, a sister publication of Advertising Age.

Regardless of Toyota's actions, domestic automakers don't expect to be alone in this niche forever. But by the time an import breaks into full-size trucks, says Mr. Raine, U.S. automakers "will be ready . . . to draw a line in the turf and tell them to come across." ■

Olds diverts off-road

Bravada hits sport-utility niche in bid to halt sag

By Michelle Krebs

In a move they hope is more than bravado, Oldsmobile is attacking the burgeoning sport-utility vehicle market.

General Motors Corp.'s Oldsmobile division concedes one-third of its 60% drop in sales since 1986 has been the result of buyers switching from cars to upscale sport-utility vehicles and minivans. It hopes the Bravada, its first sport-utility vehicle, will combat that customer drain.

The Bravada is designed to go head-to-head with Ford Motor Co.'s top-of-the-line Explorer, which sells for about $25,000. The Bravada targets the college-educated 45-year-old with an annual household income in excess of $75,000.

The sport-utility market has moved from a niche market to a high-profile, core market for manufacturers because of its size and profitability.

In 10 years, the number of sport-utility vehicles sold in the U.S. exploded about 370%, from 180,000 units in 1980 to about 850,000 in 1990.

For years category pioneer Jeep Cherokee didn't face any high-volume competition in the four-door sport-utility market. Today, it's battling a half-dozen new players.

In sharp contrast to more spartan, two-door, sport-utility vehicles, the Cherokee was gussied up to attract luxury-car buyers.

The average Cherokee buyer is 35 to 48 years old with an annual household income of more than $60,000, says Larry Baker, general manager of Chrysler's Jeep-Eagle division. In a large percentage of households, he says, the

Reaching America's Most Important Audience

The In-Store Advertising Network reaches America's most important audience – the American Shopper. And we reach the shopper right at the point of purchase, where 2 out of every 3 purchase decisions are made (POPAD).

Over 50 of the country's leading Supermarket Chains including: A&P, Bruno's, Kroger, Winn-Dixie, Giant, Pathmark, Von's, Schnuck's, Ralph's, Fred Meyer, Shaws and many more, enable the In-Store Advertising Network to deliver America's premier audience, and deliver them where and when they are ready to buy.

In the past two years, In-Store Advertising has grown to be a dominant retail advertising network. The reason for our rapid growth and success is simple: ISA delivers exceptional results for our clients. Via our network of strategically placed L.E.D. billboards, the In-Store Advertising Network combines brand sell with retail pricing. On a store by store basis, ISA delivers an intrusive and compelling incentive to purchase while the shopper is in the store.

It's a fact! Traditional media can't deliver results like the In-Store Advertising Network. Over 200 participating brands from over 60 major national advertisers have seen their sales grow month after month, averaging an exceptional +29%*.

Wagons ho! Segment set to rebound

Minivans can't kill what some call 'dowdy' practical car

By Patricia Strnad

The verdict is in: Station wagons are here to stay.

Although station wagon sales were eclipsed by minivans in '1988, leading many to predict wagons' imminent demise, they are showing impressive staying power.

The station wagon market has been steadily shrinking over the last decade, but analysts and carmakers believe the niche will rebound on the strength of purchases by baby-boomer parents who want more passenger and cargo space than a sedan offers, but less space than a minivan.

Several automakers, including American Honda Motor Co., are prepared for the niche's second wind with all-new or redesigned station wagons.

J.D. Power & Associates predicts wagon sales will reach 765,000 units by 1995—or 7% of the total car market—up from about 450,000 in 1990.

Station wagons accounted for only 4.9% of the total car market in 1989, vs. 12.6% in 1973, says Joel Pitcoff, manager of research and analysis at Ford Motor Co.

"The biggest carnage has been in the full-size wagon," Mr. Pitcoff says, adding that Ford plans to discontinue its large Ford Crown Victoria and Mercury Grand Marquis wagons next year because of low sales volumes.

Ford expects sales of the popular Taurus and Sable wagons to rise as a result. Taurus has the best-selling wagon in the U.S., accounting for about 17% of the segment and 25% of all Taurus sales.

But General Motors Corp. is more optimistic about full-size wagons and hopes to wow buyers with the redesign of its full-size, rear-wheel-drive wagons. The Buick version, the Roadmaster Estate wagon, is just now becoming widely available to dealers.

Meanwhile, Ford last spring launched station wagon versions of its redesigned subcompact Escort and Tracer models.

Toyota Motor Sales USA is considering a redesign of its Camry wagon.

Last month, Honda introduced a station wagon version of the midsize Accord, the best-selling vehicle in the U.S. for the past two model years. Honda is unusual in having completely bypassed the minivan market to focus on passenger cars and wagons.

"The Accord wagon is a stroke of genius," says John Wangers, senior managing partner at Automotive Marketing Consultants.

> "What one calls dowdy another might call cautious."

While Honda is projecting annual sales of 30,000, Mr. Wangers predicts the company could sell 70,000.

The U.S.-built Accord wagon, with a base price of $17,300, has other station wagon marketers wary of added competition but hoping their sales will benefit from the attention the Accord is expected to bring the niche.

Mr. Wangers says Honda's entry into the segment would make all wagons more acceptable for image-conscious baby-boomers. "Because of the renewed inter-

Off-road

Cherokee is in the garage next to an upscale European car. "Driving these sport-utility vehicles makes it look like you've arrived," says Chris Cedergren, J.D. Power & Associates director-competitive assessment.

The sheer size of the growing sport-utility market makes it attractive, says Michael Grimaldi, Olds' general marketing manager. Oldsmobile expects to sell 15,000 to 20,000 Bravada models in 1991. Eventually, he says, sales should reach 20,000 to 25,000 units annually.

That's still a far cry from Jeep Cherokee sales, which hit 156,118 units in 1989.

Those already established in the sport-utility market are looking for ways to hold the high ground.

In 1990, Toyota introduced a four-door 4Runner, Nissan launched a four-door Pathfinder and Isuzu, which already sold two sport utilities, added the Rodeo for 1991. Mitsubishi expanded the number of versions it offers.

Last spring, Ford and General Motors introduced four-door sport utilities as 1991 models.

Within four months, Ford says its Explorer overtook Chevrolet for the segment's sales lead.

"And it's been widening the gap every month since," claims Michael Zevalkink, truck marketing plans manager at Ford division.

High inventories forced GM last fall to temporarily close the plant that produces the Chevy Blazer and GMC Jimmy. GM's sport-utility sales were off 9% in the first 11 months of 1990, compared with the same period in 1989.

Frank Raine, Chevrolet marketing manager-trucks, blames the slow sales on the "explosion of new competition."

Mazda began in the 1991 model year selling its Navajo sport-utility vehicle. In a twist to the usual pattern, the Navajo was designed and engineered by Ford with input from Mazda. It is built at a Ford plant alongside the Ford Explorer. Mazda expects to sell be-est [in station wagons], one winner will be the Taurus wagon."

The Accord wagon's primary competitors are Ford Taurus and Mercury Sable wagons, and the Toyota Camry wagon, says David Spyra, manager of Honda division automobile advertising.

Honda expects some of the Accord wagon sales to come from current Honda owners who want the versatility of a wagon. But even more are expected to come from dissatisfied minivan owners and families with older children who feel they no longer need a minivan, he says.

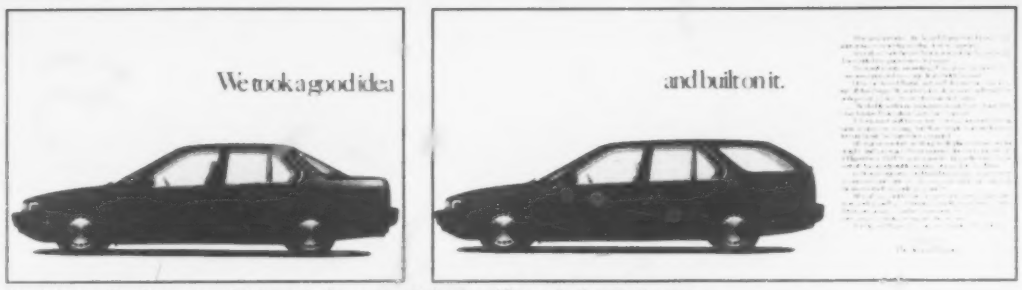
"You've got four-wheel drive on more minivans now," says Chris Wackman, VP-marketing at Subaru of America. "But when you're on a snowy road, the high center of gravity and the bigness of that vehicle is not as comforting as a car that's closer to the ground and has better handling characteristics."

Subaru, which markets the Legacy wagon, is a major player in the station wagon segment. In 1989 about 46.5% of its 136,112 unit sales came from wagons.

The increased demand for station wagons is being pushed by the baby-boom generation, says Dave Pelliccioni, national advertising manager at Toyota.

Retirees, who travel more extensively than younger age groups, also are big buyers, says Chris Cedergren, director-competitive assessment at Power. More younger buyers will be drawn to wagons as the vehicles become more highly stylized and performance-oriented, he says.

But not all consumers feel uncomfortable with the traditional wagon or even its stereotypical image as a boring, utilitarian vehicle, says Bill Vanderbok, director of auto research at Plog Research. "That dowdy image hits a very responsive chord with a lot of people," he says. "What one person calls dowdy another might want to call responsible or conservative or cautious."



Honda is sending its successful Accord after a new niche by adding a deck onto the car.

Even so, automakers are steering away from that image and positioning wagons as roomier, higher-performance versions of their sedans. Subaru advertises its Legacy wagon interchangeably with the Legacy sedan to convey their sameness.

Buick will position the Roadmaster wagon, targeted at affluent consumers with annual household incomes exceeding $80,000, as "the world's most luxurious wagon" in advertising that breaks next spring, says Jay Qualman Jr., general director of advertising.

"The Roadmaster wagon is something you could take to the country club and [you would] not have to apologize [for it], but a minivan or truck might seem out of place," he adds.

Honda is capitalizing on the success of the Accord sedan and coupe in wagon advertising, says Mr. Spyra. Ads by Rubin Postaer & Associates, Los Angeles, are themed, "We took a good idea and built on it."

"Honda's [introduction of] the Accord wagon gives us encouragement . . . that the compact wagon segment is not going the way of the dinosaur," says Mr. Wackman. □ tween 15,000 and 20,000 Navajo models in 1991.

The company is playing on the vehicle's American-built theme. It uses what Duke Hale, Mazda VP-sales, calls "aggressive, emotional" advertising with the tagline "No one knows the land like a Navajo."

All the new-found competition has taken a bite out of Jeep Cherokee sales. 11-month figures for 1990 show sales are down more than 20% from the same period in 1989.

In response, Chrysler introduced a value model of the Jeep Cherokee for the 1991 model year.

Sport-utility model sellers expect continued growth in the segment but at a more modest pace than in the 1980s.

Mr. Cedergren believes the sport-utility market has more staying power than the minivan segment. "When the kids move away from home, people are less likely to move out of the [sport-utility] segment. They may go from a four-door to a two-door or to a more sporty-looking, performance-oriented model, but they'll probably stay within the segment," he says.

As a result, manufacturers will have to redesign sport utilities almost as often as cars.

"The life cycles are shortening," says Mr. Zevalkink. "The public is demanding it. They want changes when somebody comes out with something new."

Manufacturers' product plans include a new version of the Cherokee in 1994. GM will redesign its stable of sport-utility models in the same year. Ford will freshen the appearance of its Explorer in 1994 as well.

A new Mitsubishi Montero and Nissan Pathfinder bow in the 1992 model year. Toyota brings out a new 4Runner in 1994.

It's likely these new versions will contain even more creature comforts than today's models.

"We expect demand for luxury-carlike amenities to remain high," says Mr. Zevalkink. Already, he says, Ford Explorer buyers are asking for power sunroofs, security systems and even better stereo systems. □

A little service, please!

By Therese Kauchak

Hell hath no fury like a car buyer scorned.

After shelling out hard-earned cash or signing away a substantial part of their paychecks for a few years, car buyers feel they should be coddled by their car's manufacturer.

And automakers are discovering that bringing those who feel wronged back into the showroom is a monumental task.

We decided to see how tightly an automaker would try to hold on to a customer who appeared to be slipping from its grasp.

We sent identical letters—describing real-life problems a staff member has with a now-1-year-old minivan—to 25 automakers.

The letter read:

Dear [name of appropriate ceo],

I'm a big believer in advertising. I was a big believer in your company's advertising when I bought my car late last year.

When I drove the car off the lot, I noticed some immediate problems. The salesman said, as he was pushing me out the door, "Don't worry. Just bring it back and they'll fix it."

I live 35 minutes from the dealer, and it took three visits just to get the factory foul-ups fixed.

Now, a mysterious "clunking" sound is coming from the right front wheel. The selling dealer hasn't been able to correct it; the dealer in my neighborhood keeps pushing me back to the original dealer, saying it's not his problem.

My salesman has left the dealership; my warranty expires in two weeks, and I have a car I don't even know is safe to drive.

Should I have believed your ads claiming quality, service and reliability? I'm beginning to think not.

Can you suggest how I can get my car out of this rut?

Over the next 30 days,

Woman car buyer —don't call her a niche anymore

By Julie Candler

Forget the so-called women's niche of the car-buying universe.

"It's not a niche, it's mainstream," says Danielle Colliver, director of passenger car advertising for General Motors Corp.'s Chevrolet division. "It's primarily coming from young women coming into the marketplace after [age] 18. They have to have cars to go to work."

A 1990 J.D. Power & Associates survey found that women are already 49% of the principal drivers of newly purchased cars.

That mainstream is expected to turn into a near-flood by 2000.

"We are predicting it will hit 60% female," says Luana Floccuzio, advertising manager for GM's new Saturn division.

According to a survey conducted by the Motor Vehicle Manufacturers Association, 61% of car buyers under age 25 are female. Between ages 25 and 44, 49% are female. The figure drops to 28% in the over-age-45 group.

"Guys 18 to 25 are much more likely to buy used cars," says Ms. Floccuzio. "Women are looking for peace of mind. They tend to buy new cars."

The fact that females are no longer a car-buying minority may be influencing the advertising used to address women, say marketers. Many car companies are now looking to unisex ads, rather than gender-specific ads, to target women consumers.

"There is no separate ad campaign to women," says Jim Fewel, Toyota's PR administrator. "Women are featured in some ads, but we are not singling them out. Our ads show women and men."

"We don't set out to design ads for women or men," says Gerrold Rubin, president of Rubin Postaer & Associates, Los Angeles, agency for American Honda Motor Co. "Advertising to address women . . . showing them in typical situations like driving a car pool or taking children to Little League—we don't do that. We are not producing special ads for specific media."

Lincoln-Mercury's genderless Capri commercials, using stickman figures and lighthearted music, were very successful with female consumers, says Advertising Manager Stephen Lyons. The print ads and TV spots "weren't addressed necessarily to women, [but they] brought in 65% female buyers."

Car companies may be realizing the way to a woman's heart can be the same as a man's.

"You don't have to show a chiffon dress and high heels to get women to read the ad," says Mr. Rubin. "Our ads have the potential to reach men as well as women."

"What changes in respect to the women's market is the media," says Richard Brooks, BMW corporate communications manager. "We are using Lear's, Working Woman, Harper's Bazaar and Savvy, but non-sexual, product-oriented ads."

Other publications mentioned frequently by automakers and advertising executives include Elle and Mademoiselle.

"We are increasing media buys for the women's market," says Mr. Lyons, "and considering broadening the base of luxury car advertising to upscale women's publications. I think we have underestimated this whole business in a big way."

Genderless advertising works with female car buyers, says Ms. Colliver, citing the success of Chevrolet's Geo line. Women account for 71% of Geo Storm and 73% of Geo Prizm buyers.

Women tend to buy products at the lower end of the price scale. They are strongest in the subcompact segment—buying 60% of Honda Civic four-doors, 70% of Toyota Tercels—and the compact segment—57% of Dodge Shadows and 61% of Toyota Celicas. They are represented least in the large and luxury segments—38% of BMW's 325i buyers are female.

The kind of information women car buyers seek is changing, say some automakers.

"Now you are getting women buying their second, third and fourth cars," says Ms. Colliver. Chevrolet is researching the women's market "to determine if women are getting the information they want, and if the approach is appropriate and effective."

If it's not, Chevy is likely to change its marketing strategies to better address those needs, which Ms. Colliver thinks may include an increased desire for safety and performance information.

Women "are still changing," says Ms. Colliver. "We have to be alert that we do not, as in the past, form any new stereotypes.

"We have to be in touch with the subtleties." □

PEOPLE TO WATCH

Chrysler Corp.'s William MacIntyre and his two-member staff don't measure success in corporate profits.

Mr. MacIntyre heads Chrysler's Physically Challenged Assistance Program, which provides information to consumers about adaptive driving aids and equipment and offers drivers with special physical needs an incentive of up to $500 for conversion of a Chrysler vehicle.

The program, housed at Chrysler's Physically Challenged Resource Center in Troy, Mich., was established in 1987 by Jerome York, now VP-finance, and Dodge dealer Chuck Swift, a paraplegic.

Mr. MacIntyre, a 37-year Chrysler veteran, has guided P-CAP since early 1990.

P-CAP handles 60 to 75 calls a day from the U.S. and Canada. Many physically challenged callers aren't sure where to turn to adapt their vehicles to suit their needs, says Mr. MacIntyre, 60. A major function of P-CAP is to provide free assistance regardless of the make of car involved.

Glenn Triest

William MacIntyre

Hand controls can be installed in a vehicle for less than $500, Mr. MacIntyre says. But a total car conversion, complete with a wheelchair lift, can run as high as $13,000.

In the 1990 model year, more than 2,300 Chrysler buyers participated in the cash-back program, he says.

Chrysler studies indicate about 30,000 cars a year are converted in some way to aid physically challenged drivers. Mr. MacIntyre places the number of physically challenged U.S. citizens at 43 million.

To reach that sizable audience, P-CAP has a limited advertising budget of $95,000, down from $125,000 last year. Mr. MacIntyre says the budget cut was self-imposed in light of the industry's tough times.

REALTOR® Market Delivers Huge Rewards for Auto Companies

"Through a series of ads in Real Estate Today®, we at Oldsmobile are reaching 820,000 key influencers who buy full-sized sedans in which they drive their customers to review property," says D.L. Lahti, general sales and service manager at Oldsmobile. "REALTORS® and their customers are among Oldsmobile's most important target markets, which is why Oldsmobile is the Car of Choice of REALTORS®, and why Real Estate Today® is providing the bull's-eye."

The Oldsmobile campaign began in August 1990. In September, a $500 cash-back rebate offer was added for any REALTOR® purchasing or leasing an Oldsmobile. The campaign also includes a specially designed Oldsmobile/NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF REALTORS® logo.

"We sold more than 1,200 vehicles in the first ninety days of the program," says John Yusko, dealer incentives manager for Oldsmobile. The campaign also generated over 38,000 inquiries during that same time period, according to Yusko.

Other automobile manufacturers have found that advertising in Real Estate Today® and REALTOR NEWS®, the publications of the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF REALTORS®, produces exceptional leads and new car sales. A summer 1990 campaign by Volkswagen of America received more than 28,000 responses, proving the tremendous automotive buying power of the REALTOR® market.

"We sold more than 400 vehicles to those respondents," says Ron Dusenberry, manager of advertising for Volkswagen of America. "More important, we started developing a relationship with every one of the 28,000 people who inquired."

According to a 1989 J.D. Power & Associates subscriber profile study commissioned by the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF REALTORS®, 92 percent of REALTORS® claim their cars are extremely important in their business activities. REALTORS® purchase a new car every 2.5 years, and 41 percent—roughly 320,000 of the 820,000 members of the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF REALTORS®—plan to buy or lease a car within the next year.

"A car is a tool of the trade for our people," says Jerry Jatos, senior vice president at the Association. "It's part of the way they conduct business. The automobile manufacturer benefits not only by the actual sale of the vehicle to the REALTOR® but, from actual 'test drives' that our members take homebuyers on in those purchased vehicles every time they show a home. When you consider the fact that our membership does more than 3 million transactions per year, well, that's a lot of test-driving going on."

For a free summary of the J.D. Power study results on the buying power of the REALTOR® marketplace, write or call Holly Poe Egge, Real Estate Today®/ REALTOR NEWS®, 430 North Michigan Avenue, Chicago, IL 60611-4087. Phone 312/329-8296. FAX 312/329-5978.

REALTOR® is a collective membership mark, which may be used only by real estate professionals who are members of the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF REALTORS® and subscribe to its strict code of ethics.

we got phone calls, letters—even Western Union Mailgrams.

The imports were speedier to respond than were domestics. Although we didn't include our phone number, Saab dug it up and was the first to call—only seven days after the letter was postmarked.

Rolls-Royce wins for persistence, calling on the eighth day, leaving two messages on the 11th and sending a letter on the 15th.

General Motors Corp. was the first U.S. automaker to answer our plea: both Chevrolet and Buick phoned on Day 14.

Below, we detail the diary of a disgruntled car owner.

Day 1: Ad Age complaint letter posted.
Day 7: Saab-Scania national customer service department leaves phone message.
Day 8: Rolls-Royce Motors' Midwest zone service manager leaves message.
Day 11: Volkswagen leaves an 800 phone number; Rolls-Royce leaves two messages.
Day 12: BMW's central regional office and Yugo America leave messages.
Day 13: BMW's national consumer services office makes us feel very glamorous by sending a Western Union Mailgram; letter arrives from Peugeot Motors; Isuzu leaves phone message.
Day 14: "Send us your phone number," writes the practical Volvo in a Mailgram. "Or call," they add, thinking of an even better idea; Buick sends a letter; Honda, Nissan and Chevrolet leave phone messages.
Day 15: Letters arrive from Rolls-Royce, Cadillac and Volkswagen.
Day 18: Letters arrive from Audi and Pontiac; Isuzu leaves phone message.
Day 19: They like us; they really like us! Ford's Dealer Affairs Office writes to say they "sincerely regret" the problems we've had; Mitsubishi's letter is the first to claim their chairman actually read our diatribe; still-polite men from Honda and Isuzu leave more messages.
Day 22: Letters from Isuzu and Oldsmobile arrive.
Day 27: Honda gives in and writes us a letter.
Day 28: Mercedes-Benz gives a jingle.
Day 29: Mercedes-Benz sends a Mailgram.

After a month, only seven car companies failed to respond: Chrysler, Lincoln-Mercury, Hyundai, Jaguar, Porsche, Subaru and Toyota.

Ironically, the maker of our role-model car was one of the silent minority. The car's real owner, however, is not surprised.

"Our warranty is up, so I'll have to eat the cost of repairing it now. I suppose the whole thing will fall to pieces tomorrow. Isn't that what happens with warranties?"

This is hardly the voice of a repeat buyer. □

Marketers pull ads

coverage, which was extensive during the initial hours of the war.

"I don't think [ads are] proper [during war coverage]; there's a backlash potential, and you have to ask what would you gain from it," said Louis Schultz, exec VP-director of media services for Lintas USA, New York, whose Lintas Campbell-Ewald unit in Warren, Mich., handles General Motors Corp.'s Chevrolet division.

Brad Ball, president of Davis, Ball & Colombatto, Los Angeles, which handles nine regional McDonald's accounts, said he received word from the fast-food chain's national headquarters discouraging any ads in or around news coverage.

"They said we should keep the real world away from our ads, to keep them away from that reality," Mr. Ball said.

Other advertisers took a completely opposite view.

Kellogg Co. spokesman Dick Lovell said the cereal marketer didn't change its advertising or ad schedule and has no plans to do so. If ads were scheduled to run on the networks, Kellogg let them run—even on news coverage of the war.

Advertisers' plans to avoid time on war coverage didn't always work. TV spots for Toyota and Isuzu appeared on ABC-TV's "Nightline" last week against their wishes.

The U.S. Department of Defense last week ordered all paid TV and radio military advertising suspended indefinitely, according to a department directive. The order included recruiting ads for the joint services as well as for the individual Armed Forces.

Ads in other media and broadcast public service announcements for the Armed Forces will continue.

Chevron Corp. postponed $3 million to $4 million worth of buys, including spots on NFL and National Basketball Association telecasts, said Jim Gordon, manager of retail advertising and sales promotion.

"The attention deserves to be given to the developments in the Middle East," Mr. Gordon said. "We don't want to fly in the face of the war coverage."

Trans World Airlines pulled its print schedule and canceled TV spots slated for yesterday's telecast of the NFL's NFC championship game pre-game show on CBS.

GULF CRISIS

"I have no intention of running anything else until people calm down and live normally," said Shelly Kravitz, TWA VP-advertising and leisure marketing. "I'm trying to divorce [TWA] from as many commitments as I can."

"We'll have to take it a step at a time and see what we'll do," said Paul Mulcahy, VP-advertising at Campbell Soup Co.

Campbell had no immediate plans beyond its decision not to air ads during news coverage for the first 48 hours of war, he said.

Pepsi is monitoring the situation to ensure its fun-loving, upbeat advertising via BBDO Worldwide, New York, fits the mood of the country.

"We're sensitive to the potential for major and very quick change in public sensibilities, and we would respect and respond to that appropriately," said spokesman Gary Gerdemann.

Some advertisers pulled ads because of inappropriate content.

Norwegian Cruise Line canceled the scheduled regional airing of a TV spot from agency McKinney & Silver, Raleigh, N.C., that depicted the war room of a naval ship.

Northrop Corp., a defense contractor, pulled a page b&w ad from The National Journal a day before the political weekly hit the streets Jan. 18. The ad by Bockman, Los Angeles, showed a B-2 bomber.

The page was quickly replaced by another defense contractor, BDM International, whose agency, Stackig, Sanderson & White, McLean, Va., created in one day an ad congratulating the U.S. Department of Defense and U.S. troops.

Anheuser-Busch is considering putting on a special message saluting America, agency sources said. But Chevrolet already has nixed that idea.

"Anything that reminds people [about the war] is not in super-good taste," said J.C. "Jim" Perkins, Chevrolet's VP-general manager.

The war's potential effect on car sales appears to wipe out hopes GM would maintain its first-quarter ad spending at 1990 levels, said Shirley Young, GM's VP-consumer marketing.

She confirmed reports that the automaker's first-quarter ad spending will decline from a year ago, though she didn't specify by how much.

Ms. Young said the economy is forcing advertising to be more "sober" and focused on value, trends that will only be exacerbated by the Persian Gulf War.

"I think you'll see a much greater sense of realism in terms of soberness and fundamentalism in advertising," she said. ☐

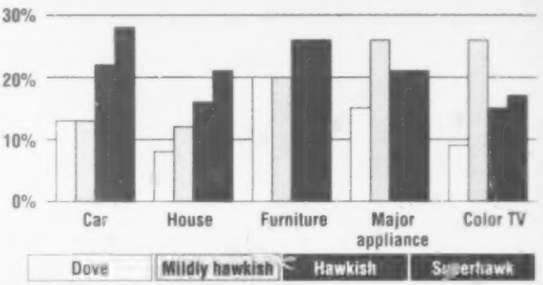
Consumers react to war

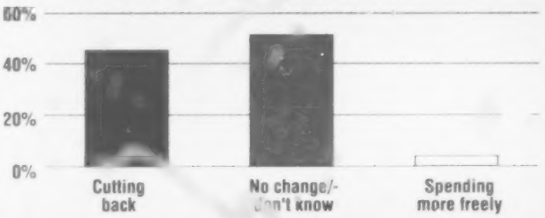
What were your spending plans?

"The people who were most in favor of attacking Iraq are also most inclined to be shopping for consumer goods. Hawks are driving this economy," says researcher Leo Shapiro. Research conducted by phone the weekend of Jan. 6 showed those who most favored war were most likely to be in the market for major purchases.



Now that we are at war, will these plans change?

Nearly half the adults surveyed within three hours after President Bush's Jan. 16 address to the nation said they thought they will be cutting back on spending. The most commonly named changes were putting more money in savings, cutting out luxury goods, conserving gasoline and delaying major purchases.



How will war affect the economy?

Although some believe the war may relieve the pressure of uncertainty that has hurt the economy, most people surveyed after President Bush announced the offensive against Iraq were pessimistic about the nation's economic future.

Are you now fearful of air travel?

The airline industry could feel the most immediate domestic impact from the war. Three of four persons surveyed immediately after President Bush announced the attack on Iraq said they now feel less willing to fly. The No. 1 reason cited was fear of terrorism.

cisions on cancellation options for second-quarter units bought in last year's upfront sales period, fearing many would cancel if forced to decide.

Almost all upfront buyers had asked for and received extensions to Jan. 15 because of the holidays.

"Options are taking a back seat with people trying to decide what to do now that this is a shooting war," said Jon Nesvig, exec VP-sales, Fox Broadcasting Co.

Late Friday however, agency media buyers said most network advertisers had decided to exercise some portion of second-quarter options, canceling an estimated 30% of their upfront commitments—or $300 million to $400 million—compared with about 20% last year.

Cancellations in daytime, late-night and news dayparts weren't as severe, running about even with last year, network sales executives said.

Prime-time cancellations could give the networks more than ample inventory to give advertisers make-goods for spots preempted by war coverage.

Few expected the Big 3 networks to continue with 24-hour coverage into the weekend.

The hope at ABC, CBS and NBC was to resume normal programming Friday night and throughout the weekend with news updates and expanded versions of news shows.

The networks tried to sell time in war coverage, but few advertisers seemed willing to shift spots originally bought in entertainment shows.

"Specific audiences are needed for specific products," said Bart McHugh, senior VP-director of national radio/TV programming at DDB Needham Worldwide, New York. "If you bought an entertainment show, you don't achieve the same thing with coverage of the Middle East."

Another concern is whether spots slated during war coverage are being aired by affiliates. Agency executives last week started hearing rumors of local stations blacking out spots in network news coverage.

Channel One, Whittle Communications' in-school TV network for teens, suspended all advertising Jan. 17 to devote its entire 12-minute broadcast to coverage of Operation Desert Storm.

Beginning Friday, it again began featuring two minutes of advertising daily.

As advertisers withdraw commercials or are squeezed out of network TV by pre-emptions, newsweekly magazines—which themselves have devoted a massive amount of editorial resources to war coverage—may benefit from a trickle-down effect.

"We've received a flurry of calls from people asking about our fast-close capabilities," said Stephen J. Seabolt, advertising sales director at Time.

He said he was told by one client that TV spots often are perceived as program sponsorships, but magazine ads aren't since a consumer pays for a magazine.

Newsweek was trying to keep its ad close deadlines flexible to accommodate additional business, said Publisher Peter Eldredge.

"Since [the war began], we really haven't had any advertisers who have gone into a tuck," said Karl Spangenberg, senior VP-ad sales for Business Week.

At USA Today, Renee Lewin, VP-marketing services, said advertisers in last Friday's edition would get a "bonus" and appear free in the first-ever Saturday edition, a 12-page insert devoted to the gulf war.

The newspaper ordered a 50% to 60% hike in the number of copies of the Jan. 17 edition for newsstand and box sales. The daily expected Jan. 17 sales to exceed the 2 million mark, and perhaps approach its all-time record of 2,448,444 set last Aug. 31.

On Jan. 17, the 1.2 million-circulation Los Angeles Times, the nation's largest metro daily, added 250,000 copies, its biggest expanded print run in decades.

The Times Mirror Co.-owned paper said it had "a few cancellations" from advertisers, but declined to identify them.

The top news and talk radio stations in Los Angeles, KABC-AM, KNX-AM and KFWB-AM, went commercial-free Jan. 17.

"People don't want to hear an ad for a hemorrhoid clinic or Toyota of Orange when maybe their next-door neighbor or a loved one is fighting for their lives in the Middle East," said Jan Cromartie, KFWB promotion manager. ☐

CBS news hurting

Prestige of CBS takes direct hit from Gulf war

By Wayne Walley

The Tiffany leadership image of CBS News has become an unexpected casualty in the Persian Gulf War—and taking the most heat is anchorman Dan Rather.

Mr. Rather's current contract with CBS has at least two more years, sources say, but some industry observers believe the network might be forced to make a change and oust him from the anchor duties he's held at "CBS Evening News" for nine years.

When hostilities broke out Jan. 16, more viewers tuned to ABC and NBC than CBS, the once-proud home of broadcast news luminaries Edward R. Murrow and Walter Cronkite.

Even Cable News Network, the 24-hour cable channel, almost reached as many viewers as CBS during head-to-head prime-time news coverage Jan. 16 and 17, causing many in the TV industry to wonder about the future of CBS News.

"CBS News is no longer the leader or the perceived leader," said Kal Leibowitz, president of KSL Media, New York. "'60 Minutes' is still a bright star for the network, but 'Nightline' helped build an image for ABC, and Capital Cities, before it merged with ABC, owned TV stations that were No. 1 for news in their markets. Locally, they still dominate the news, and now the network does, too."

Some outsiders blame Mr. Rather for the network's performance, but other factors such as budget cuts, the closure of international and domestic bureaus, and increased competition have contributed to the decline of the once-mighty news organization.

"The public is seeing now what buyers have seen for a while: ABC is better, and it's the end of an era for CBS," said Doug Seay, senior VP-director of broadcast programming for Hal Riney & Partners. "I'm not sure it's Dan Rather's fault. Top management at CBS is looking at the business, not the creative, side of news, and this is the result."

The telecast, long the ratings leader, is in a neck-and-neck race with NBC for second this year, trailing ABC's "World News Tonight," which has topped the evening news ratings race for more than a year.

"You don't think to turn on CBS the minute something happens anymore," said Werner Michel, senior VP-corporate programming for Bo-

Super Bowl ads in late scramble

By Patricia Winters

The Persian Gulf War sparked a spate of last-minute changes in advertising on Super Bowl XXV, led by Pepsi-Cola Co.'s decision to cancel its 800 number call-in promotion for Diet Pepsi.

Pepsi-Cola announced Friday it was withdrawing its call-in Diet Pepsi game after concerns were raised by the Federal Communications Commission that the promotion could cripple the nation's telephone system during a time of war.

The soft-drink marketer decided to replace ads about the promotion with other creative (see Page 46 for Bob Garfield's review of Super Bowl ads).

A Ray Charles spot that broke Jan. 1 but wasn't scheduled for the Super Bowl was set to run instead, in both 30- and 60-second versions.

Pepsi also quickly created a :30 pre-game spot explaining the canceled promotion.

In the post-game show, when Pepsi was to run a :30 announcing the winners of its canceled promotion, the marketer instead was scheduled to run a :30 kicking off a Diet Pepsi automobile giveaway promotion originally scheduled to start next month.

The promotion was created by Pepsi with assistance from Clarion Marketing & Communications, Greenwich, Conn. BBDO Worldwide, New York, handles the advertising.

But while Pepsi was able to change the TV spot, it was unable to pull some regular print ads and yesterday's national free standing insert that carried the 800 number.

Pepsi said consumers who called the 800 number would hear a recording about the cancellation.

Pepsi went ahead with its Super Bowl ad plans, even though it scrapped its 800 number sweepstakes.

Anheuser-Busch and Coca-Cola Co. also made changes last week in their Super Bowl advertising because of the changing mood of the country related to the Persian Gulf War.

After all-day meetings Thursday and Friday, Coca-Cola executives decided Friday to alter the creative part of its

WPP mulls cash options

Japanese equity stake on list of scenarios

By Gary Levin and David Kilburn

WPP Group Chief Executive Martin Sorrell is negotiating with his lenders to ease WPP's cash crunch, and several scenarios are being floated on what he might do.

These options include a proposed equity infusion by an international consortium, issuing new shares on the Tokyo Stock Exchange, a renegotiation of debt or a combination of alternatives.

WPP, strapped by a $620 million debt load, a weak advertising climate and a cash shortage, is said to be the target of a proposal from a group with possible Japanese involvement to buy a minority stake in the London-based holding company for J. Walter Thompson Co., Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide and Hill & Knowlton.

One source saw the proposal as a way for Mr. Sorrell to avoid selling assets.

Tokyo-based Dentsu said it had been approached early this month about helping to refinance WPP. The agency wouldn't be specific about who approached it but did say categorically that it had no interest in any such activity.

A Japanese agency source said the giant Mitsubishi Corp. was seeking Dentsu's participation.

Mitsubishi, which set up a house ad agency last year, is known to be serious about expanding in the communications industry.

Ad tax initiatives hit Kansas, N.M.

By Steven W. Colford

1991 is barely four weeks old, and the ad industry is already trying to fend off tax threats in two states.

Last week in New Mexico, state Rep. Albert Shirley (D., Church Rock) introduced legislation that would place a 5% excise tax on all in-state media purchases for advertising, whether broadcast or print.

Money raised by the proposed tax would go toward alcohol rehabilitation through the state's Community Alcohol Treatment & Detoxification Fund.

Dee Schilling, executive director of the New Mexico Broadcasters Association, said the bill is unlikely to garner enough support to pass but said lobbying of key House committee members was under way.

Gov. Bruce King, a Democrat, campaigned last year on a no-new-taxes pledge, Mr. Schilling said.

A legislative aide said the bill had no co-sponsors and may be scheduled for a hearing before the House Consumer & Public Affairs Committee this week.

In Kansas, Gov. Joan Finney proposed a tax on in-state professional services that spared advertising but perhaps only for a time.

Advertising was omitted from the governor's proposal after considering the administrative problems associated with an ad tax, as well as the problems incurred by Florida in its unsuccessful attempt in 1986 to tax advertising, said Martha Walker, the governor's press secretary. Ms. Walker said the Legislature likely will decide to extend the proposed 4.25% tax to advertising when it considers the governor's proposal.

Possible problems collecting the tax revenue contributed to Gov. Finney's decision to exclude advertising, said Susan Duffy, director of research and revenue analysis in the Kansas Department of Revenue.

> "At this point, the decision was made to exclude advertising. But some legislators have said, 'Why exclude that?' "

"If a magazine is based in Washington and sold in Kansas, how do we apportion that?" Ms. Duffy said. "At this point, the decision was made to exclude advertising. But some legislators have said, 'Why exclude that?' and I expect [an ad tax] will be discussed by the Legislature."

But even as legislatures across the nation convene to battle virtually universal budget shortfalls and search for remedies, Washington state and San Francisco are trying to restrict alcohol and tobacco advertising.

The Washington Liquor Control Board, which has been pressured for months by the state's medical community, this week is expected to recommend some restriction of alcohol advertising. If approved by the three-person board, the restrictions would become binding unless superseded by legislation.

Last week, state Rep. Mike Heavey (D., Seattle) introduced a bill that would ban TV advertising of wine and beer (AA, Jan. 21). Rep. Heavey, chairman of the state's House Commerce Committee, held a hearing on the measure last week.

The Legislature also passed a non-binding resolution calling on Congress to ban "the use of images of automobiles, race tracks, speedboats and other references to driving and speed in alcoholic beverage commercials on TV."

In San Francisco, the city's public utilities commission last week banned alcohol and tobacco advertising inside and outside municipal vehicles, including buses, trolleys, cable cars and the underground light rail system. Some displays will remain through 1991 because of contractual agreements.

Denver, Boston and Seattle have already banned such ads from their municipal vehicles, and the Bay Area Rapid Transit subway in San Francisco banned alcohol and tobacco ads in 1987. ❑

Langer tells Levine no

By Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver's search for a new ceo was thrown for a loop last week when the leading candidate, Lowe & Partners CEO Andrew J. Langer, decided not to take the job.

In a memo to Lowe staffers Friday, Mr. Langer said: "There has been a lot of speculation lately that I'm going to Levine Huntley. I'm not."

Mr. Langer couldn't be reached for comment.

Levine Huntley founder Harold Levine earlier last week had confirmed the agency was negotiating with Mr. Langer, 48. But media reports of the acknowledgment may have driven a wedge between the agency and Mr. Langer.

"I'll bet Andy's very angry," an agency source said. "Harold put Andy at risk and upset all of [Lowe's] clients."

Industry observers had said that, as a former creative director, Mr. Langer would be well-suited for the job at Levine Huntley, a creatively oriented shop.

Now, Mr. Levine and Robert Berenson, the exec VP at Levine Huntley parent Grey Advertising who's coordinating the search, will try to move quickly to hire another candidate.

Mr. Levine, reached Friday before Mr. Langer's memo went out, said he wasn't aware of any change in Mr. Langer's situation. But he added that there were other candidates.

"Everybody is interesting. Nobody is saying no," Mr. Levine said, adding he wants to fill the job as soon as possible.

"It's important to get it done quickly, but it's delicate when you're putting in a ceo," he said.

Sources say the other leading candidates are former Ammirati & Puris President Edward Vick, J. Walter Thompson Co. Exec VP Stephen Bowen, and Keye/Donna/Pearlstein President Leonard Pearlstein. Mr. Levine wouldn't confirm or deny contacting the executives.

A. Langer

Messrs. Vick and Pearlstein declined comment; Mr. Bowen couldn't be reached for comment, and it's not known if any of the men have been contacted by Levine Huntley.

Though Grey's Mr. Berenson and Mr. Levine both knew about Mr. Schmidt's plans, they hadn't finished their search by the time Mr. Schmidt left.

"We really have to get this done right away," said one Levine Huntley executive. "People are very nervous, and our clients are very nervous."

The $280 million agency's biggest client, Subaru of America, with billings of about $80 million, has a contract that expires in September. And a number of agencies have already tried to pitch the Subaru account.

Subaru isn't talking with any other agencies, said Chris Wackman, VP-marketing.

He said there's "absolutely no credence" to a report McCabe & Co. is a candidate for the account.

A source familiar with Subaru's plans said when the contract expires, the automaker will choose between the incumbent and DCA, the U.S. unit of Japan's Dentsu. Dentsu handles Subaru in Japan.

Subaru's U.S. marketing staff doesn't want the account at a Japanese agency because they fear they will lose control over marketing to the parent company, the source said.

Subaru's parent, Fuji Heavy Industries, has expressed a preference for doing business with Dentsu and is unlikely to let the account move to a less substantial agency than Levine Huntley.

Nearly all the larger U.S. agencies already have car accounts. ❑

New pet food scrap in supermarkets

Purina, Kal Kan, Quaker try high-price lines

By Julie Liesse and Bradley Johnson

It may be the dogfight of the decade.

Three leading pet food marketers are unleashing more than $125 million in the biggest marketing blitz to hit the $6.7 billion-plus industry in years.

Ralston Purina Co., Kal Kan Foods and Quaker Oats Co. are simultaneously launching broad superpremium pet food lines, each with heavy spending targeted at consumers, retailers and pet professionals.

Purina and Kal Kan will go nose to nose—Purina with a $40 million to $50 million push for an expanded Purina O.N.E. line, and Kal Kan with a $50 million introduction of Expert "scientific" pet foods.

Right on their tail is Quaker, which will spend $37 million to tell the story of new "advanced formula" Cycle dog food.

"It will be an extremely competitive year," said Terry Block, VP-director of pet food marketing for Purina.

At stake is not only money and market share, but the future direction of the pet food industry and where its products are sold. As pet food sales in supermarkets have slowed, sales in specialty outlets have boomed.

Purina, Kal Kan and Quaker want to collar in supermarkets consumers who are making special trips to pet shops and veterinarians' offices to buy the superpremium brands of Hill's Pet Products and Iams Co.

"If this isn't the biggest event in the category in years, it's one of the biggest," said Doug Mills, VP at Quaker and general manager of its pet food division. "With the change in where pet food is being sold—with $1 billion now sold outside supermarkets—this is a big event. That's an indication of how big the opportunity is."

"Just as Americans have discovered they need to be conscious of their own health, I think that in the area of pets, people, in one sense, are simply projecting their own anxieties and perceptions on their animals," said John Murray, VP-sales and marketing for Kal Kan.

"I see Expert as analogous to [ConAgra's] Healthy Choice," he said.

"Life-stage nutrition" is a core concept of all three brands. Like Iams and Hill's Science Diet, all three will be sold in different formulas to match a pet's age and activity level. Like Iams and Science Diet, all three carry premium price tags.

"We asked our retail customers 'Would grocery stores have accepted a superpremium pet food line four years ago?' They said, 'No, no way,'" Purina's Mr. Block said. "First, we had to establish that you could sell a superpremium pet food in supermarkets. The original O.N.E. has done that, and as retailers' knowledge of category dynamics has grown, now we can expand the line."

"With the change in where pet food is being sold—with $1 billion now sold outside supermarkets—this is a big event."

To the original O.N.E. (Optimum Nutritional Effectiveness) dry dog food, introduced four years ago, Purina has added puppy and Lite Dog formulas, plus O.N.E. cat and kitten formulas.

Purina had tested a line of canned dog and cat foods as well and a line of dog treats.

"We culled these 17 dry food items out as the best," Mr. Block said. "We want consumers to be able to buy Purina quality products anywhere they choose to shop."

To that end, Purina continues to

Reebok teams with George Lois

By Pat Sloan

Reebok International's Pump is being pumped up by a new ad agency and a new "competitive" strategy in a campaign that broke during Super Bowl XXV.

In a departure from its usual style, the athletic shoe marketer took a direct shot at Nike, its primary competition, in TV spots featuring pro athletes Boomer Esiason and Dominique Wilkins.

The spots kicked off Reebok's new $20 million advertising and promotional effort being handled by Lois/GGK New York, instead of agency of record Hill Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston.

The Lois/GGK work has sparked speculation Reebok's relationship with Hill Holliday is strained, especially since media buying was switched to DeWitt Media, New York, last fall. But VP-Marketing Services David Ropes denied any problem.

"I made it clear to them as I did when we named DeWitt for media buying that I have a philosophy on a project basis of going to where the creative talent lies," he said. "Will I engage another agency from time to time on a project basis? Yes."

Hill Holliday executives declined comment; sources indicated the agency was upset but had little recourse.

In a 30-second spot, Mr. Esiason, quarterback for the Cincinnati Bengals, takes a poke at Nike endorser Bo Jackson, a Los Angeles Raiders running back.

"Hey, I switched to the Pump for support, protection and a custom fit," Mr. Esiason says. "Which means Boomer knows something that Bo don't know: pump up and air out." He then throws a pair of Nikes off-screen.

Upscale titles finally feel it

War, overcrowding contribute to surprise first-quarter losses

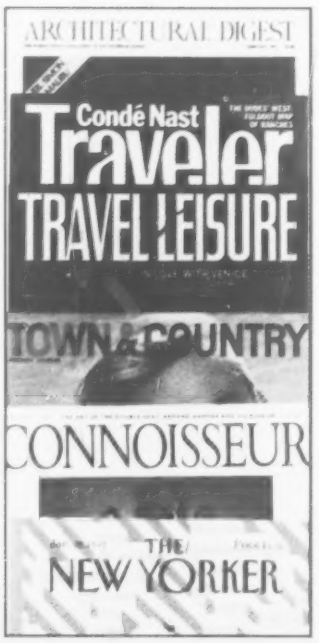
By Scott Donaton

The perception that upscale magazines are immune to economic downturns has been shattered by the realities of war, dwindling ad budgets and changing consumer values.

The bottom dropped out suddenly in the first quarter for the consumer titles edited for the affluent that had escaped the ad page declines posted by many last year.

Short-term factors such as the Persian Gulf War have played a significant role in the falloff, as travel and corporate image advertising—mainstay categories in most upscale magazines—have been scaled back drastically. But industry observers say publishers must also address long-term issues, such as overcrowding and shifts in consumer values.

"Clearly, there's always the perception that the rich are protected from dips in the economy, [but] the current downturn has exploded that conventional wisdom," said Patrick DiChiro, managing director of the Prestige Marketing Group, which specializes in the luxury goods market.



"When we went into January and people started beating the war drum, we just had the bottom fall out," said Steven T. Florio, president of Advance Publications' The New Yorker. "I lost half of all of the travel advertising that was booked [for the first quarter] in one day, and I lost the other half the next day."

The result? Instead of being up 40 ad pages in the first quarter as projected, The New Yorker will be down 65 pages.

The New Yorker had projected the first quarter of 1991 would be even better than 1990, when it saw ad pages rise 1.9%.

Gourmet, Conde Nast Traveler, HG and Art & Antiques were also on the plus side last year, but Architectural Digest, Yachting, Town & Country, Travel & Leisure, Golf Digest, Golf Magazine, Bon Appetit, Smithsonian, Con-

'USA Today' has eye on baseball

By Eric Weissenstein

ARLINGTON, Va.—USA Today, in a bid to broaden its sports coverage, will start publishing USA Today Baseball Weekly in April.

Thomas Farrell, exec VP-general manager of USA Today, will also be publisher of the new tabloid. The first issue will appear April 5, the Friday before opening day of the 1991 baseball season.

In adding a sports weekly to the in-depth coverage already provided by the daily, USA Today will position itself to compete more directly with national sports weeklies such as The Sporting News and other baseball publications like Baseball America, Mr. Farrell said. He denied the weekly is a reaction to or will compete with The National, the troubled national sports daily.

"Seeing the reaction to our daily newspaper, there seems to be a strong demand for more statistical information regarding the nation's pastime," Mr. Farrell said.

USA Today Baseball Weekly will carry a cover price of $1 and be sold at newsstands and by subscription.

Preliminary ad rates for color ads are $5,365 for the back page, $9,389 for a center spread and $4,471 for a full page B&w; rates range from $1,325 for a quarter-page to $6,955 for a center spread.

There may be some early discounts to attract advertisers, Mr. Farrell said.

Ad packages will be offered for both USA Today and the weekly, Mr. Farrell added, with Baseball Weekly available as an add-on to USA Today advertisers. No advertisers have been secured yet.

Although the office of J. Walter Thompson Co. Vice Chairman Peter Schweitzer exudes comfort, the chances are that the self-confessed sailing nut would rather be tacking up the Detroit River than overlooking it from the office on the fifth floor of the Renaissance Center.

His walls sport memorabilia from his 40-year passion, along with some off-the-wall items, including a 19th century lifeboat compass; a 126-year-old desk and drawing table from the agency's original New York offices; and an antique Canadian army helmet presented to him by Ronald Burns, now ceo of JWT North America, New York. "[Mr. Burns] said I'd need the helmet for Ford meetings," says Mr. Schweitzer, adding that he dons the iron headgear "when things need shaking up."

Surprisingly, 'benefits programs are expanding, not contracting'; a glance at how marketers' plans stack up

With unemployment at a recent high, it seems companies would be more interested in how to unload employees than in how to keep them

As it happens, the opposite is more to the point, with companies taking a long-term view and putting together increasingly comprehensive benefits packages for employees.

"Benefits programs are expanding, rather than contracting," says Darlene Aiken, news coordinator for corporate news services at Eastman Kodak Co. "Many corporations, including Kodak, have cut back on the number of employees. If we are going to cut back, we need to get a hold of the very best employees, and this is a way to do that."

Ms. Aiken also says Kodak has found aggressive benefits packages can be extremely cost-effective. "It is more cost-effective to retain employees rather than to recruit and train new ones," she says.

Changes in demographics have forced corporations to reconsider what benefits work best in attracting and keeping top-notch employees, however.

"With the increasing number of women, two-career families, single parents and children of the elderly in the work force, there needs to be flexibility and support for employees to be productive in the work place," says Jeff Leebaw, manager-editorial services, Johnson & Johnson.

Boosting productivity isn't companies' only motivation in adding flexible benefits programs. With about 80% of working women in their childbearing years and an estimated 80% expected to have children during their careers, accommodating workers with families has become a business necessity.

"We created these programs basically because of the changing nature of the work force," says Tim Huelsman, director of employee benefits at Warner-Lambert Co. "It is critical to attract and retain the changing components of the work force."

To get a fix on how marketers' benefits stack up, free-lance writer Wendy Hickey contacted the top 24 Leading National Advertisers of 1989. Of those, 14 told Ad Age what salaried employees can expect beyond a paycheck.

To provide a complete view of the benefits programs at these companies, we asked for a rundown of the basics, such as vacation days after one year and compensatory time, as well as more progressive concepts, such as part-time tracks for executives who need to cut back from full-time work, or "telecommuting."

"It is critical to attract and retain changing components of the work force."

Here's what we found:

programs for employees who choose to work from home via computer, modem and the telephone.

SEEING RED IN MOSCOW

Trying to run agency outpost in Russia is daunting as exec tries to overcome phone phobia, paperwork and five-course lunches

By Joel M. Ostrow

For Bill Munsell, chief operating officer of the first joint venture between a Soviet and U.S. ad agency, communications problems cause him to work "twice as hard as in the U.S. but get half as much done."

His workday at Young & Rubicam/Sovero in no way mirrors what it was in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, where Mr. Munsell, now a Y&R exec VP and director, was chairman of Y&R-owned Creswell, Munsell, Fultz & Zirbel.

"You work a kind of funny clock because you have a day here, and then by 5 o'clock you begin a second day," when he can reach New York.

But even with the luxury of a direct line, chronically busy international circuits mean it still takes a half-hour to place a call to the West, and conversations often are cut off inexplicably.

As a result, the 65-year-old Mr. Munsell is regularly in the office past 10 p.m. trying to talk to Y&R's Western clients.

He says there's a "a vast difference" between what he does here and what he was accustomed to at CMF&Z. Mr. Munsell says his primary task is to position the agency for clients "who will want to be here in the future."

His own goal when he arrived here in early June was "to make a contribution to building a communications resource in a unique place." But, he warns, "the guy who comes in and expects to accomplish a lot in a hurry will be frustrated and disappointed."

Take lunch, for example. No business is conducted over lunch because "lunch here isn't lunch, it's dinner," he says.

Elaborate, five-course meals in restaurants last three hours, and few places allow for a quiet business conversation over a quick bite.

So Mr. Munsell makes do with cold hot dogs and watery mashed potatoes in the noisy bars at the International Trade Center, where Y&R's offices are located, or retreats to his 450-square-foot apartment in the adjacent hotel for a sandwich of peanut butter and jelly—imported from the U.S.

And absolutely no business is conducted over the telephone, Mr. Munsell says. "No one will talk on the phone." Partly a cultural difference, partly tied to lingering fears of KGB wiretaps, Soviets demand that all business discussions be face to face.

Mr. Munsell first must meet with Soviet officials to discuss proposals, then write them in a "protocol," a non-binding letter of intent, before any decisions can be reached, he says. That paperwork can then be faxed to the various parties involved. "Everybody's got a fax," he says. But with faxing comes the familiar telephone problems.

The Working Life

Bill Munsell is learning to "work a kind of funny clock."

Seven months into his two-year stint, Mr. Munsell is a bit disappointed with his progress.

"I'd love to look back at the end of two years and say I'm leaving [it] a better place, and I think I will be able to point with pride to certain things," he says. "I think the bad news is the list won't be as long as I would have liked. However, one must make beginnings, and we've made one." □

MACUSEFUL

Training center brings expertise to the agency's door with hands-on schooling to get the most out of the shop's computers

By Julie Steenhuysen

No matter how many thousands of dollars an agency spends on a computer system, some terminals often end up as plastic desk ornaments because users are too busy working to figure out how to use them.

That's one reason Mind Over Macintosh, a California computer training company, devised Co-piloting, a one-on-one training program using a student's own work.

"It's only through watching the computers gather dust that people become aware of the need for training," says Bruce Kaplan, founder and president of MOM.

Conventional computer training generally is offered at a central training facility using prescribed course work. While most training companies are willing to offer one-on-one training at a customer's request, Co-piloting was designed specifically with ad agencies' needs in mind.

"Co-piloting allows [students] to actually create an ad with somebody there helping them do that, rather than going through a set of prescribed motions," says Shannon Pitts, director of creative technology at Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide, Los Angeles, and a MOM client.

At Ogilvy, for example, 10 art directors have each completed 11 hours of classroom work in Quark XPress and are waiting to schedule their Co-piloting hours around clients' projects, Mr. Pitts says.

Rubin Postaer & Associates has been working with Mind Over Macintosh trainers since the agency purchased its Macintosh system two years ago.

"We use Co-piloting a lot in presentation services," says Sylvia Orzel, computer operations supervisor. "The Co-piloting has worked very well there because with deadlines, you don't have the time to 'futz' around."

However, she says, it can be expensive. The basic rate for Co-piloting is $90 per hour with a three-hour minimum, but agencies can get volume discounts, says Justine Rosenheck, MOM marketing director.

In some cases, agencies can bill clients directly for work done while Co-piloting, helping pass on the costs of the training.

Ogilvy has spent a total of $12,640 on computer training, with $4,320 set aside for Co-pilot training, all of which will be conducted on clients' time.

Mr. Pitts says the fact that Co-piloting was billable influenced his training plans.

"It was definitely a factor in that it was going to pay for itself. There is the initial cost of [the classroom] training, but that is easily offset by the amount of money we can save doing our mechanicals and type in-house."

Because type and mechanicals normally would be produced at West Graphics, Ogilvy's production studio, a billing structure for computer time already is in place. Mr. Kaplan says many agencies do not have similar billing guidelines.

At Rubin Postaer, for example, art directors use the computer for type and as a comping tool.

"We don't use [the computer] for finished work, so it really isn't billable," says Bob Francis, VP-associate creative director and manager of collateral advertising.

"If you could bill it out, it would pay for the training. But I'd hate to try to figure out what that rate ought to be, because you'd sure be slow [getting the job done while training]," he says.

Mr. Pitts, however, argues a project completed during Co-piloting would still be faster than using traditional tools.

"I'm always there if anybody has any problems," he says.

For Mr. Francis, Co-piloting has another draw.

"It sounds like a lot of money, but ultimately it's the hook of spending an afternoon [with a trainer] that gets people to use [the computer]."

Macintosh "is the simplest computer on Earth. For the power vs. simplicity, it's as good as it gets. But let's face it, it's still pretty damn tough," he says. □ unexpected news. Former client McDonald's Corp. was returning with $55 million in business.

THE AX

The agency also won two other pieces of new business, with the upshot being, "All of these [Maybelline] people are still at the agency—and doing something else," Ms. Gillette says.

While that might be attributed largely to luck, Ms. Gillette says the agency has never engaged in mass firings.

"You can't turn around and grow if you just take an ax to people," Ms. Gillette says. "It's ridiculous. It's not how great agencies are built."

But if the replacement business doesn't come along, the agency absorbs greater losses and the people eventually fired not only are left hanging, but may miss out on new job opportunities.

"It seems to us that once a [client's] decision is irrevocable, it does no one any good to allow things to fester," Mr. Wilhite says.

"It doesn't make sense to be Pollyannaish about the future; [to say] we've got all this experience in a given category and in 60 days we'll have an account in here to take its place.

"I think it's more appropriate to make the presumption that you won't get that income back instantaneously. You have to realign the organization to maintain its fiscal health."

When agencies make large staff reductions, they tend to hit the working grunts first, apparently assuming senior people retain and attract clients.

But doing so risks "cutting off the agency's hands and feet," says Mr. Roth. His answer: Cut fewer low-level jobs and reduce senior executives' salaries.

Proper handling of the psychological impact of account losses, on individuals and the entire agency, is difficult but critical, agency executives say.

If employees must be released, "you do it as compassionately as possible, and as fairly as possible," says Mr. Wilhite.

As to how to handle remaining employees, "It is critical that you remind the agency that this [client] decision is not a blanket indictment of our capabilities in any way," he says.

"You work hard to restore the confidence of the organization in itself," he continues, "because they are the very people who are . . . going out to acquire additional business that will replace that which was lost." □

Titles bid soft year adieu

By Scott Donaton

December 1990—like December 1989—was a soft month for magazine ad pages. But 1989 was a record year for the industry; 1990 was a minor disaster.

Magazine ad pages dipped 1.1% to 15,202.2 in December 1990 compared with the year before, Publishers Information Bureau reports. PIB-tracked titles finished 1990 with 171,689.1 ad pages for the year, down 3.7% from 1989.

Ad revenues rose 1.9% to almost $6.8 billion for the year, PIB reports. But that figure doesn't take into account off-rate-card deals and on-rate-card discounts, now common practice.

Overall, 74 of the top 100 magazines—including nine of the top 10—suffered ad page declines in 1990, while 25 posted gains. Entertainment Weekly made its debut on the top 100 list in its first year of publication, with 905.8 ad pages.

For the 16th consecutive year, McGraw-Hill's Business Week carried more ad pages than any other U.S. magazine, though pages fell 10.3% to 4,407.

Forbes finished a strong second despite the death last year of founder Malcolm Forbes, which industry observers had predicted would hurt the every-other-weekly. It carried 3,939.2 ad pages in 1990, up 0.9%.

Rival Fortune saw pages fall 11% to 3,360.2, finishing fourth overall. People was third with 3,625.8 ad pages, down 3.9%.

The clear-cut winner in the business field was the North American edition of The Economist, bucking the downward trend to finish the year 11th overall with 2,643.8 ad pages, a 12.3% gain.

The revenue leader for the year was Time Warner's Time, with $381,852,410, up 2.3%. Time Warner titles filled the second and third spots, too: People's revenues rose 6% to $345,791,839, while Sports Illustrated's $335,690,172 was a 0.3% decline.

TV Guide ($320,308,116, down 0.8%) and Newsweek ($253,253,187, down 1%) rounded out the top five.

In addition to Business Week and People, other top weeklies clearly were among the hardest hit by the downturn in magazine advertising.

Time's ad pages were relatively flat, down 0.2% to 2,727.9. Newsweek carried 2,302 ad pages, a 7.7% drop. And U.S. News & World Report's 2,010.9 pages represented a 2.1% decline.

Sports Illustrated had 2,672.4 pages, down 10.4% and New York Magazine, with 2,657.5 pages, was off 14.1%.

The New Yorker finished the year on the plus side with 2,456.3 ad pages, a 1.9% gain over 1989.

As expected, Good Housekeeping regained its position as the ad page leader in the women's service field, passing Family Circle. Good Housekeeping's ad pages rose 2.3% to 1,740.4. Perhaps more significantly, Family Circle's pages fell 16.5% to 1,684.9. Ladies' Home Journal finished third in the field with 1,532.3 ad pages, down 5.2%.

Many upscale or affluent magazines—once considered "recession-proof"—also registered declines in 1990, an indication of how widespread the advertising downturn has become.

Architectural Digest carried 1,821 ad pages, a 3.8% drop. Yachting, with 1,623.9 ad pages, was down 2.1%. And Town & Country's 1,606 pages were off 3.6%.

Parenting magazines received mixed signals last year. Category leader Parents carried 1,487 ad pages, down 3.7%. But Parenting was up 14.4% with 837.7 ad pages. Child, which last year increased frequency to 10-times-yearly from every-other-monthly, finished the year with 576.1 ad pages, up 10.3%.

Among titles bucking 1990's downward trend: Entrepreneur (2,004.4 ad pages, up 14%); Mirabella (1,088.3, up 48.7%); HG (1,079, up 9%); Financial World (966.1, up 24.3%); Art & Antiques (830.2, up 10%); The Atlantic (702, up 13.4%); Longevity (440.8, up 46.3%); Decorating Remodeling (427.2, up 89.6%); and Cooking Light (382.8, up 9.9%). □

zell. "CBS News has been hurt by internal economics. I don't know if you can pin that on Dan Rather, but yes, he has been hurt by this. It's unfortunate because he is a hell of a reporter."

Other agency executives aren't so kind, describing Mr. Rather as "stiff" in his delivery as anchor and a primary reason that ratings for the "CBS Evening News" have suffered, dropping to an average 10.0 Nielsen rating during the 1989-90 TV season. In 1985-86, the half-hour evening telecast earned an average 13.3 rating.

"I have to believe CBS is looking for a replacement," said a media buyer who asked to remain anonymous. "He's been in trouble for at least three years with CBS executives and not just because of the ratings."

CBS, however, might not be able to make a change. News viewers tend to prefer stability and a change could mean losing more viewers to ABC, NBC and even CNN, which has reaped a windfall of attention during the Gulf war.

Mr. Rather couldn't be reached for comment, and CBS executives refused to speculate on his future, pointing out that he's still under contract. Instead, they defended their position as a network that delivers "quality" news coverage.

"We are in a totally different time. People aren't watching qualitatively but quantitatively," said George Schweitzer, senior VP-communications for CBS/Broadcast Group. "In cable homes, viewers have a 24-hour wire service, and they go for the pictures. Our main mission is to be reliable and give qualitative reports. People are still turning to CBS for our prime-time specials. They are watching what we have to say."

One factor hurting CBS and the other networks is the escalating cost associated with covering the Persian Gulf War.

Each network is facing the potential for at least $50 million in war-related news-gathering costs for about $1.5 million a week), in addition to their average $260 million to $350 million annual news division budgets.

High-level network executives say war news-gathering costs are threatening the companies' overall 1991 earnings.

"When all is said and done, we're talking about a net loss for the networks as a result of the war," said Peter Lund, exec VP at CBS/Broadcast Group.

Network executives agree that dramatic realignment and financing of their news divisions will be necessary in the coming years if the operations are to remain in business.

Industry experts say it is conceivable that the current financial crunch could force one of the networks out of the daily news-gathering business—a prospect ABC, CBS and NBC officials defiantly dismiss.

"I don't think you can make those kinds of decisions right now based on a war the likes of which have been fought only twice since World War II," said Howard Stringer, president of CBS/Broadcast Group and former CBS News president.

But, he said, "If we continue covering this war with the same initial level of intensity, there's no question we all will be staring at some serious deficits and long-term decisions. ... something has to give."

"I think the war dramatizes the issues we've all been wrestling with for some time now. It certainly has focused people's thought on the role of network news divisions in a system in which there is an all-news, all-war channel. And given the fact that the audiences and ad dollars are shrinking for all three networks, something has to give," Mr. Stringer said.

In a comprehensive but gloomy report, Richard MacDonald, a partner of MacDonald Grippo Riely, recently forecast a $125 million loss for the CBS TV network in 1991, and is advising clients to sell their stock.

However, Mr. MacDonald expects CBS Inc. to recover in 1992 to an overall $287 million in earnings, bolstered by a network recovery to $116 million in operating cash flow. □

Diet Coke "Crack the Code" Super Bowl ads because they were no longer appropriate to the mood of the country, said Bob Bertini, manager-public relations, Cola-Cola USA. Lintas:New York handles Diet Coke.

It was a corporate decision, he said. No one had criticized Coca-Cola's earlier plans.

Coca-Cola initially had planned to devote all its Super Bowl advertising, starring actor Leslie Nielsen, to the Diet Coke "Crack the Code" promotion, running since mid-January.

Game pieces have been distributed on Diet Coke packaging that were to be held up to the TV screen during a special half-time descrambler spot.

Mr. Bertini said the descrambler commercial would run, but the creative was being changed on Friday to make it less frivolous and more straightforward.

"The ['Crack the Code'] commercials are very lighthearted in their approach with Leslie Nielsen, and we thought that with the seriousness of the situation they weren't appropriate for the Super Bowl audience in their previous form," he said.

At A-B, the brewer pulled one :15 segment of "Bud Bowl 3" that reportedly included an explosion. At press time, the brewer also was planning to replace one regular Budweiser spot with a "Here's to you America" patriotic commercial.

Also at the last minute, A-B bought at least one more :30 spot and rearranged its time slots. D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis, handles.

The Diet Pepsi promotion, billed as the world's largest toll-free call-in game, asked consumers to call during the Super Bowl to qualify for one of three $1 million prizes.

Pepsi said the promotion could handle about 3 million calls, and it expected that many calls to be made.

But the FCC said according to the U.S. Telephone Association the promotion could have generated 50 million calls which could severely cripple the nation's phone system.

But sales promotion executives questioned the figure. Jeffrey McElnea, president of Einson Freeman, Paramus, N.J., said it would be "more than unprecedented."

With 118 million viewers expected to tune in to the Super Bowl, 50 million calls would be more than one call per household, he said. Pepsi is not one of his clients.

"Off the seat of my pants, I'd say 3 million to 5 million calls would be correct," said Vincent Sottosanti, president of Comart-KLP, New York. Mr. Sottosanti doesn't handle any Pepsi business either.

The USTA said the 50 million call figure was based on information from Bellcore, a research company. Bellcore couldn't be reached at press time.

Mr. Sottosanti said if he were handling the Pepsi account, he would've checked with the FCC before launching the promotion, but Mr. McElnea said "it's not standard procedure" to check with the FCC.

Pepsi's troubles apparently began when local phone companies learned about the 800 number promotion. The USTA, as the trade association for local carriers, said it alerted its national membership of the promotion last week for fear it would tax the system.

One phone company source said someone even called the U.S. Department of Defense and asked that Pepsi be forced to cancel the promotion for security reasons.

The FCC contacted Pepsi, Super Bowl network ABC and the long-distance phone companies last week "to get assurances that the local exchange carriers wouldn't have problems Sunday," said Jim Spurlock, special assistant to the director of the FCC's Common Carrier Bureau.

He noted a letter from U.S. Rep. John Dingell (D., Mich.) to Pepsi, asking the marketer to kill the campaign, raised the same concerns.

Mr. Spurlock said concerns about overloading phone systems were particularly great in the New York state area—home of both Super Bowl teams, the New York Giants and Buffalo Bills—and that phones in the region might have been particularly crippled.

Pepsi said it still likes the idea of the phone promotion and couldn't say whether it would try it again another time. □ market Pro Plan dog and cat foods through the specialty channel and Clinical Nutrition Management products through vets only.

In supermarkets, Purina is also rolling out Nature's Course, positioned as an organic dry dog food (see story, Page 39).

Actor Robert Urich will tell the O.N.E. story in a network, spot and cable TV, and print campaign breaking this spring. The campaign, themed "Purina O.N.E. Second to none," is handled by Scali, McCabe, Sloves, New York.

Direct marketing will support, as will "detailing" to veterinarians—personal visits by Purina representatives.

Purina, like Kal Kan and Quaker, is recommending that retailers establish a self-contained superpremium pet nutrition center, with pamphlets on pet care and nutrition, and even interactive computers in some stores.

It's likely some supermarkets will feature a Kal Kan Expert center right next to a 4-foot O.N.E. pet nutrition center.

Kal Kan Expert, arriving on supermarket shelves this month, is the broadest of the three lines—36 items including canned and dry varieties of dog and cat foods, plus dog treats.

An extension of Kal Kan's flagship Pedigree dog and Whiskas cat food brands, Expert will be sold in various life-cycle formulas, including low-calorie, high-performance and senior (AA, Sept. 24).

Mars Inc.-owned Kal Kan will back Expert with a nearly $20 million network, spot and cable TV, and print campaign, said John Murray, VP-marketing and sales.

Co-op newspaper ads will appear in February, and the national TV campaign will start in early April, Mr. Murray said.

Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York, handles.

Expert will sell for about 20% less than specialty-store equivalents, Mr. Murray said. If consumers trade up, he said, the average annual expenditure for pet food in the U.S. should increase.

At about $60 a pet, the U.S. number is substantially smaller than the $95 spent on each pet outside the U.S., he said, reflecting the popularity of comparatively inexpensive dry pet food.

Quaker will boost the price of the 20-year-old Cycle line as it reintroduces Cycle with an "advanced formula."

Cycle will be marketed in the same varieties—canned and dry foods in puppy, adult, light and senior formulas. Unlike Purina and Kal Kan, Quaker isn't venturing into cat food with the brand.

The "advanced formula" version is made from higher quality ingredients, Quaker said.

"We've got one of the original 'nutritional' brands, and we've done well with it; it's a $100 million-plus brand," Mr. Mills said. "We see Cycle as a great vehicle to go after this business."

Cycle will be reintroduced in a network TV and print campaign set to break in early March. Quaker is currently testing creative work from incumbent agency J. Walter Thompson USA and Bayer Bess Vanderwarker, both Chicago.

A decision on which agency will handle the brand should be made in the next few weeks.

Nearly half the Cycle marketing budget will be used to push the line's 40-pound "Big Bags," Mr. Mills said 85% of dog food sold in specialty stores is sold in packages of 20 pounds or more.

Quaker is also making vets a key target of the Cycle relaunch, with ads in professional journals, product sampling and detailing. □

To our readers

Thanks to all of us, the planet is in trouble.

From the factory owner who spills poison into our drinking water, to the teen-ager who swills soda from a disposable bottle, to the primitive hunter who kills rhinoceroses, we are all guilty of contributing to the world's growing environmental problems.

The funny thing about much of the environmental damage is that it has been accomplished while we were simply trying to do what human beings are supposed to do, improve their lives and make progress. Everything from the automobile to the disposable diaper was developed to make life better for the user — and to produce a profit for the manufacturer.

But something new has been added in recent years to this striving for a better life. What we used to call progress is being interrupted by a worldwide revolution. In this case, the revolutionaries are consumers, and their battle cry is for products and services that will preserve a cleaner, healthier, richer environment for themselves and their children.

During the past few years, marketers have been scrambling to find the information and develop strategies to meet these new consumer demands. We hope that this issue of Advertising Age you are reading will help lead them to at least some of the answers.

In producing this special edition, we have learned a lot ourselves. One of our goals was to produce a whole issue of Advertising Age on recycled paper that compared with our regular stock. This we accomplished. But we learned recycled paper is more difficult to locate, it offers only limited varieties and it costs considerably more than non-recycled paper.

But then, this was the purpose of this special issue along with our Green Marketing Summit held on Jan. 29 in New York: to learn.

Michael A. Marcotte-Brooke Hummer

Advertising Age* Publisher Joe Cappo

There is also much to be learned from the exclusive Gallup survey that Advertising Age commissioned to determine consumer attitudes toward the environment and how marketers are responding to the "green revolution."

Learning from the experiences of others is also important. That's why we have included case studies from key marketing companies such as Procter & Gamble Co., Mobil Corp., McDonald's Corp., Wal-Mart Stores and Loblaw Cos.

In all of this, our intention has not been to point fingers of blame at anyone, especially since we feel that none of us is blameless. What's done is done. We can't change the past, but we can alter the course of the future.

What we hope to accomplish from this issue, as well as the Green Marketing Summit, is to promote a greater sense of awareness among everyone about possible damage to the planet. We feel that every government, corporation, institution and individual should have an environmental strategy governing the way they live and do business.

This concentrated focus on a social cause is a new step for Advertising Age, although we have covered "green marketing" as a separate topic for years and will continue to do so in the future. We don't casually produce midweek editions of this publication unless the subject demands it. Environmental marketing demands it.

We believe this particular issue breaks new ground by casting a more intense light on the challenge of marketing to an environmentally conscious world.

We hope that we—and you—are ready to meet that challenge.

In this issue

8 Gallup's green poll

Asked to name one company that's most "environmentally conscious," consumers named Procter & Gamble most often (6%), but 66% of those surveyed said "none" or "don't know." McDonald's came in second place with 4% of the total.

12 From hero to villain

Mobil Chemical Co. launched a degradable Hefty trash bag two years ago but now finds itself labeled the bad guy in a bitter marketing tale.

16 Defending diapers

Procter & Gamble has taken steps to counter the barrage of criticism from environmentalists against disposable diapers.

20 Commitment on dispay

Wal-Mart Stores, the first retailer to call for more environmentally friendly products, lets the public know about its policies in everything from recycling centers to green tags on shelves.

26 Green ads on review

Advertising Age reviewer Bob Garfield looks at some of the current ad campaigns that tie in with the environmental movement, and discovers a bit of overkill.

28 Seeking uniform guidelines

Marketers want the federal government to issue national environmental marketing standards to end confusion about such terms as "recycled" and "recyclable."

▲Procter & Gamble uses magazine ads to explain how disposable diapers are compostable. See Page 16

Loblaws was the first retailer to come out with its own GREEN line of products. See Page 38►

30 Fishing for seals

Several organizations, including Green Cross Certification Co. and Green Seal Inc., hope to help consumers sift through advertisers' rhetoric by offering environmental seals of approval.

32 Big Mac's about-face

McDonald's Corp. was an early advocate of environmental concerns, but public misperceptions forced dramatic changes.

36 Who's who, environmentally

A survey of the 100 leading national advertisers shows what environmental marketing programs they have in place and who's in charge of these activities.

38 Enviro products pioneer

The Canadian-based Loblaws supermarket chain was the first to offer a line of "environment friendly" products, thanks to a "boring" environmental handbook.

46 Don't just say green

Companies without green products expose themselves to real risks if they engage in green marketing. Such "greenwashing" may work for a time, but sooner or later consumers will catch on, says Denis Hayes of Green Seal.

This "Green Edition" of Advertising Age has been printed on Niagara of Wisconsin Paper Corp.'s Pentair 50# Recycle Gloss. The paper meets the June 1988 U.S. Environmental Protection Agency's standard for recycled printing and writing papers by containing a minimum of 50% recycled fiber.

Exclusive first look at how consumers feel; Wal-Mart, McDonald's, cereal companies stand out; beer, diapers, labeling, advertising have a long way to go

P&G gets top marks in AA survey

By Dennis Chase

AD AGE GALLUP SURVEY

Procter & Gamble Co. is the most "environmentally conscious" marketer in the U.S., according to a new nationwide poll.

But a whopping majority of respondents admit they can't name any marketer they feel is environmentally conscious.

Consumers across the board are looking for marketers to do more for the environment and say they will change their buying behavior to favor companies that are environmentally sensitive, according to the first annual Advertising Age/Gallup Organization "green marketing" environmental study.

The survey is believed to be the first to ask consumers to rate marketers and brands on concern for the environment.

The survey measures consumer opinion—not behavior—and "is trying to find out if it is in the consumer's mind that environmental concern is something he, and marketers, should have," said Gallup's VP-Analysis Gale D. Muller, who helped prepare the survey. "The information is valuable because advertising appeals more to a person's value system than to his actual behavior," he said. "Products that have this environmental appeal have an advantage over products that don't."

When the survey asked a random sample of consumers across the U.S. to name one company that's most "environmentally conscious," P&G received the most support, being named by 6% of respondents.

But 66% of those surveyed said "none" or "don't know."

Respondents were asked to name any company that comes to mind as enviromentally conscious.

P&G's total is understated, because another 2% of the respondents answered "Downy" or "Tide"—both P&G products.

McDonald's Corp. came in second place with 4% of the total.

The survey asked respondents to rate individual product categories and companies by their concern for the environment.

Cereal marketers received the highest average ratings, followed by soft drinks, retailers, toothpaste and laundry soaps and detergents.

Cosmetics among worst

The bottom five categories, with relatively low ratings for environmental concern, are beer, automotive, fast-food restaurants, cosmetics and disposable diapers.

The findings were determined by asking respondents to rate how concerned individual marketers are about the environment. Marketers and brands could be rated "very concerned," "somewhat concerned," "somewhat unconcerned," "very unconcerned," and "don't know." Final ratings were calculated by adding up marketers' total points within that category to reach a mean, or average score.

The highest rating, "very concerned," was assigned 4 points for each answer; "somewhat concerned," 3; "somewhat unconcerned," 2; and "very unconcerned," 1. "Don't know" responses were not tabulated.

Cereals received a 3.13 score; soft drinks ranked 3.01; retail chains, 2.93; toothpaste, 2.92; and laundry soaps and detergents, 2.87. These were followed by beer, at 2.83; automotive, 2.82; fast-food, 2.80; cosmetic marketers, 2.55; and disposable diapers, 2.46.

Top product categories in U.S. ad spending were chosen for the survey if there were obvious environmental issues associated with the categories. Within each category, the brands and companies selected were the top ad spenders for 1989, with some exceptions. For example, R.H. Macy & Co. actually spent more in '89 on advertising than Wal-Mart Stores in the retail category, but the latter was included because of its leadership role on environmental issues.

McD excels in fast-food

In the fast-food category, McDonald's emerged as the clear winner, with Burger King Corp., Wendy's International and Kentucky Fried Chicken Corp. significantly lower.

More than half the respondents, 67%, said the fast-food giant was either "very concerned" or "somewhat concerned" about the environment, compared with 57% for Burger King, Wendy's, 53%, and KFC, 50%.

McDonald's overall average score, at 2.94, was a statistically significant difference over Burger King's 2.76, Wendy's 2.81 and KFC's 2.7.

A statistically significant difference in this survey generally is one in which a greater than 0.05 gap exists between the different mean scores. This can vary from category to category, however.

In a runoff between P&G's Pampers disposable diapers and Kimberly-Clark Corp.'s Huggies, 42% of the respondents said Pampers was "very concerned" or "somewhat concerned" about the environment, compared with 37% for Huggies.

Pampers' mean score was 2.5, significantly higher than Huggies' 2.42.

For both Pampers and McDonald's, the relatively small percentage of "don't knows" helped bolster their final "concerned" score.

Huggies and Schering-Plough Corp.'s Maybelline received the lowest mean scores of any marketer surveyed.

In laundry soaps and detergents, P&G's Tide was the clear winner, with a mean score of 3, compared with Unilever's Surf, at 2.87, and Clorox, at 2.74. Tide received 64% of respondents' votes as being "very concerned" or "somewhat concerned," compared with 53% for Clorox and 41% for Surf.

The only other clear winner in its category was Wal-Mart. The survey found that 19% of respondents ranked the retail chain as "very concerned" about the environment, far ahead of second place K mart Corp. and Sears, Roebuck & Co., which tied.

Wal-Mart's overall mean score of 3.12 outranked K mart and Sears, at 2.87 each, and J.C. Penney Co., at 2.85.

In other categories, no marketer significantly outranked its competitors.

P&G's Crest and Colgate-Palmolive Co.'s Colgate toothpastes both registered about the same mean scores—2.98 and 2.95, respectively. SmithKline Beecham's Aqua-Fresh ranked third, at 2.82.

High marks for cereals

No significant difference emerged among cereal companies either, although all the mean scores were generally higher than other categories, resulting in a high ranking for cereal companies' environmental concern.

General Mills received a 3.14 mean score, as did Kraft General Foods' Post unit. Kellogg Co. received a 3.12 ranking.

In the soft-drink category, Pepsi-Cola received a 3.02 ranking; Coca-Cola, 3.01, and 7UP, 2.99. However, the two cola giants outranked 7UP in percentage of respondents ranking the marketers as "very" or "somewhat" concerned about the environment. Coca-Cola received 68%, Pepsi-Cola, 67%, and 7UP, 64%.

Among beer marketers, Anheuser-Busch Co.'s Budweiser outscored Miller Brewing Co.'s Lite beer in concern for the environment, by mean scores of 2.85 to 2.79. Coors scored 2.84. The differences, however, aren't statistically significant.

In the automotive category, no one car company outranked another significantly, but U.S. companies received higher votes in the "very concerned" category than their Japanese counterparts.

Ford Motor Co. received a 2.85 score, compared with General Motors Corp., Chrysler Motors and Honda Motor Co., each of which received 2.83. Toyota Motor Corp. received 2.8 and Nissan Motor Co., 2.75.

But GM, Ford and Chrysler all outshone their Japanese competitors in the "very" and "somewhat" choices, with Nissan getting the lowest score of all. However, these differences appear to be statistically insignificant, or just borderline.

Cosmetics marketers, which includes Revlon Group, with a 2.59 ranking, and L'Oreal and Lancome, with 2.54, and Maybelline, with 2.51, scored very low on the overall ranking.

The survey also delved into whether the majority of Americans consider themselves environmentalists, and where they stand on various environmental issues.

The survey found that 79% of the respondents consider themselves "strong environmentalists" or "environmentalists," and only 17% consider themselves "non-environmentalists."

Northeast strong

The survey found the Northeast has a disproportionate number of "strong environmentalists," compared with the South Central, North Central and West regions.

Average age of "strong" environmentalists is older than the overall sample—48 years old compared with 37 for the entire sample.

Respondents were asked a series of questions to determine whether they think American business and industry, the government, and the American public are "too worried about the environment, not worried enough, or express about the right amount of concern about the environment."

The results show most people believe no one group is concerned enough about the environment. The "American public" comes out the best, but not by much—68% of respondents felt this group is "not worried enough" about the environment. That compares with 73% for government and 76% for business and industry.

'Green' ads questioned

Most people have little confidence in "green" advertising claims and much more confidence in green seals and label claims.

When asked if they felt "very confident," "somewhat confident" or "not confident that you know how to select products which are really environmentally responsible," three-fourths of the respondents said they were "very" or "somewhat" confident.

But when asked to rate their confidence that product advertising "provides accurate information about the impact on the environment," only 8% of respondents said they were "very confident," 43% said "somewhat confident," and 47% said "not confident."

When asked to rate their confidence that product labeling provides accurate information about the environment, 12% said they were "very confident" and 51% "somewhat confident"; only 35% said they were "not confident."

This anti-ad bias showed up again when respondents were asked to rate "green" advertising compared with other influences on purchasing decisions.

The survey sample was asked whether a "green seal of approval, which was introduced by Earth Day organizer Denis Hayes and would be placed on the labels of certain products meeting specific environmental criteria," would have a "great impact, "some impact" or "no impact" on their purchasing decisions.

Thirty-four percent responded that a green seal would have "great impact" and 49% said "some impact."

Similarly, "a program sponsored by the federal government to approve certain products meeting specific environmental impact criteria" rated 25% for "great impact" and 55% for "some impact."

When asked the same question about "marketing which states a laundry detergent is good for the environment because it contains no phosphates," 26% said "great impact" and 54% said "some impact."

But when asked about "a television advertisement which states that a certain brand of plastic laundry bottles contains up to 35% recycled plastics," only 16% said it would have a "great impact" on their purchasing decision, 54% said "some impact," and 28% said "no impact."

Eager to change

On specific issues, respondents come off as eager to change behavior to improve environmental quality, even if it means paying higher prices for a product.

Asked if they would "favor a ban on chlorofluorocarbons and other chemicals known to damage the ozone layer even if it means higher prices for air conditioners, refrigerators and some other consumer products," 80% of respondents said they would favor a ban and only 13% would oppose one.

When respondents were asked if they would switch to a brand of toothpaste in an aluminum tube marked "recyclable," if the brand they were using was not in such a tube, 34% said they would switch if the price was the same or "slightly higher." Thirty-two percent said they would switch regardless of the price, and 29% said they would either not switch or switch only if the price of the "recycled" brand was lower.

The survey asked if respondents would switch to a super-concentrated laundry detergent, which used fewer cups per load than their current detergent, and 33% said they would switch if the price were the same or slightly higher, 30% said they would switch regardless of the price, and 31% said they would not switch or switch only if it cost less.

They were asked if they could name the laundry soaps or fabric softeners, if any, that use recyclable materials in their packaging, or that offer refills to "cut down on the number of plastic laundry bottles being disposed of."

P&G's Downy won the refill race by a large margin, grabbing 18% compared with 3% for P&G's Tide and 1% each for P&G's Cheer and Dash and Unilever's Wisk, All, and Snuggle.

"Don't know" was cited by 72% of respondents. In fact, only Downy actually comes in refillable containers in the U.S.

Points for Tide

On the recyclable packaging question, Tide was cited by 9% and Downy by 8% of respondents, with 2% each citing All, Cheer and Wisk, and 1% each citing Snuggle, Church & Dwight's Arm & Hammer, Amway, Colgate-Palmolive's Fab, Unilever's Surf and P&G's Era and Dash; 70% responded "Don't know."

In fact, some liquid and granule versions of the brands cited are in partly-recycled containers, and some are not.

On another issue, when the survey asked only that portion of the sample that had had a baby using disposable diapers in their household in the past two years (16% of the total sample) whether they would switch to a diaper marketed as "biodegradable," 42% said they would switch if the price was the same or slightly higher, 33% would switch regardless of the price, and 22% would not switch or switch only if the price was lower.

In one surprising result, there were strong suggestions in the survey that newspaper and magazine readers might consider dropping their subscriptions to publications that don't use recycled paper.

The portion of the sample that subscribes to at least one local newspaper (74%) was asked whether they were "likely to cancel their subscription . . . if you knew the newspaper to which you subscribe does not use any recycled paper . . ." Forty-one percent said they were "very" or "somewhat" likely to cancel their subscriptions, and 56% said they were "not likely."

The survey found 73% of respondents are aware of environmental safety labels on packages.

When asked what activities household members have done in recent years to try to improve the quality of the environment, 86% said they "voluntarily" recycle newspapers, glass, aluminum, motor oil and other items; 82% said they bought products made from or packaged in recycled materials; 71% said they improved insulation or the heating or air conditioning system in their homes; 68% said they bought biodegradable plastic garbage bags and the same percentage bought products in refillable packages. □

How Ad Age survey was conducted

The Advertising Age/Gallup Organization green marketing survey of 1,514 consumers was conducted in December 1990. Households were selected using the accepted industry standard for random digit dialing.

The maximum expected margin of error is plus or minus 2.5%.

The sample can be projected to all households with telephones in the continental U.S., and the results are weighted and match the U.S. as a whole. Characteristics of the sample are: 48% male, 52% female; ages 12-17, 10%, 18-24, 13%, 25-34, 21%, 35-44, 17%, 45-54, 12%, 55-64, 12%, 65 and older, 15%. Twenty-one percent of the sample was located in the Northeast U.S., 33% in the South Central region, 26% in the North Central, and 20% in the West.

Hardee's mulls decision

ROCKY MOUNT, N.C.—Hardee's Food Systems eliminated N W Ayer, New York, after it pitched the fast-food chain's $50 million-plus account Feb. 1, sources said. Hardee's will make a decision early this week and is thought likely to drop Ogilvy & Mather and choose between J. Walter Thompson USA and Chiat/Day/Mojo, all New York.

Volvo review nears end

ROCKLEIGH, N.J.—Volvo Cars of North America is expected to name an agency this week for its $40 million account. Messner Vetere Berger Carey Schmetterer, New York, is seen as the favorite because President Robert Schmetterer was managing director of the Volvo account when he was at Scali, McCabe, Sloves, New York. Scali resigned after revelations that cars were rigged for a demonstration commercial. Other finalists are Altschiller Reitzfeld/Tracy-Locke and Rosenfeld, Sirowitz, Humphrey & Strauss, both New York.

'Life' sets special issues

NEW YORK—Time Warner's Life will start publishing weekly, themed issues on the Persian Gulf War the week of Feb. 18. The issues will be standard magazine-size, sold on newsstands only and published for an indefinite period. Time Warner will distribute 600,000 copies each week to single-copy outlets. Life, which has been considering a switch to weekly frequency, will keep publishing as a monthly for now and has postponed plans to publish a prototype weekly

Major marketers slice 2nd-quarter TV buys

By Wayne Walley

The economic recession, exacerbated by the Persian Gulf War, has led a handful of major advertisers to cancel the maximum allowable percentage of their upfront TV ad commitments for the second quarter.

Advertisers that have exercised cancellation options include such stalwarts as Procter & Gamble Co., General Motors Corp., Unilever U.S. and McDonald's Corp., said sources familiar with those companies' plans.

New first-quarter scatter market spending is also at a standstill, and the circumstances bode ill for the next upfront sales market, media experts said.

Advertisers often cancel a portion of second-quarter spending commitments, but the amount canceled by P&G and other companies is larger than usual and could conceivably take hundreds of millions of dollars out of the TV marketplace.

Sources said P&G has exercised its maximum allowable second-quarter cancellation options on all networks, including Fox Broadcasting Co., and in syndicated TV shows, citing "business reasons."

Industry observers pointed out that the networks' second quarter is also P&G's fourth fiscal quarter, and they speculated the cancellations might be linked to the company's desire to improve its yearend bottom line.

"We've seen upsets before but never on this massive scale. It's shaking people up."

P&G executives refused to comment on the move for "competitive reasons."

Sources said all of Unilever's units, with the exception of Chesebrough-Pond's, exercised the maximum amount of cancellation options because of the uncertainties caused by the Persian Gulf War.

Although sources said Kellogg Co. had also pulled out of a significant portion of its upfront commitments, a company spokeswoman said it had made no changes in its ad plans.

Other advertisers including McDonald's, Mobil Oil Corp. and Tropicana Products exercised cancellation options last month.

Most advertisers retain the right to cancel up to half their network upfront commitments 90 days before a quarter starts, but sources said some advertisers, including P&G, agree to a smaller percentage of cancellation rights.

Advertisers on average usually keep about 80% of the time that could be canceled, but this time the average is between 65% and 70%, network sources said.

The 90-day deadline hasn't been strictly

KGB may tap BBDO . . . for ads

By Joel M. Ostrow

MOSCOW—The KGB is considering an image makeover.

BBDO Worldwide, which operates a joint venture shop here with German publisher Burda and Vneshtorgizdat, a state-owned foreign trade publisher, has approached the Department for Societal Relations of the Soviet Committee for State Security—better known as the KGB—with proposals for an image campaign, said Andrey V. Olegov, deputy director of the KGB's press center.

"They presented us with a brochure titled, 'How We Can Help You,' " Mr. Olegov said. The brochure explained BBDO's services and the agency's expertise in image campaigns.

"I am, of course, personally interested," Mr. Olegov said. "How the committee will proceed is still absolutely unclear."

He said more meetings are needed before a decision will be made.

"We tend to think that the best advertisement is our own work," he said.

Bruce Macdonald, BBDO general director here, said the agency wants to help the KGB "dissociate itself from its embarrassing history" of repression and lawlessness to fulfilling roles in Soviet society that "only they can perform," such as fighting organized crime.

In initial discussions, BBDO is assessing whether the KGB is indeed changing, he said, and if so, will try to convince officials they should communicate the positive

Shaky industry studies 'Allure' launch

By Scott Donaton

When the first issue of Allure reaches newsstands Feb. 26, the magazine itself may not be as important as what its launch represents.

With the magazine industry battered by recession, war and a steep downturn in advertising, the publishing world is pinning its attention and hopes on Conde Nast Publications' latest entry in the women's magazine field.

Allure is the first, boldest—and perhaps only—major launch of 1991 and also the first title Conde Nast, led by Chairman S.I. Newhouse Jr., has developed from scratch since it launched Self in 1979.

If the company's attempt to penetrate the overcrowded women's beauty/fashion field in such a hostile environment is successful, Allure could give the industry a much-needed boost.

Some magazines launched last year have already fallen by the wayside, and many of those that remain are struggling. Scores of development projects, meanwhile, have been scaled back or shelved.

"It's very bold and gutsy," said Valerie Muller, media director at Pedone & Partners, New York. "I think a win by a big company right now would be a shot in the arm. We're all tired of hearing that there's no more room for change."

Conde Nast itself needs a win. The company spent millions of dollars trying to reposition Woman before folding the mass-market monthly last fall. And the relaunch of Details as a young men's style magazine is off to a somewhat

Y&R, Dentsu ready regional strategy

By Jon Lafayette

Young & Rubicam and Dentsu are abandoning their dream of a multicultural global agency network.

Their joint venture, HDM, is being transformed into a regionally structured agency group now that HDM's third partner, Eurocom, has bowed out. Three largely independent agencies with separate identities have emerged.

In the U.S., where HDM is being merged with Lord Einstein O'Neill & Partners, the agency will be called Lord, Dentsu & Partners, with offices in New York and Los Angeles billing about $220 million.

In Asia, 11 former HDM agencies with billings of $420 million will be renamed Dentsu, Young & Rubicam.

In Australia and New Zealand, five agencies with billings of $238 million will be known as Mattingly, after Chairman David Mattingly, whose agency was acquired by HDM in 1989.

The agency groups will report to Dentsu, Young & Rubicam Partnerships, a central board responsible for overall management and coordination.

Board members include Chairman Shinzo Ueno, President-CEO Gary Burandt, Senior Exec VP-Chief Financial Officer Alain Rousset and Senior Exec VP Megumi Niimura.

HDM's direct marketing operations, to be reorganized and renamed this week, will also report to the board.

Mr. Burandt said the regional structure was adopted because "the fact is that there are no global accounts at HDM and there are few of those in the world. We've given [the agencies] names that will give them the most help in those regions."

HDM, formed in 1987, was never able to form a strong identity. Its name was forgettable among the other alphabet-soup agency titles, and it was often overshadowed by its giant parents.

The agency's death knell sounded because Eurocom thought the returns it was getting from HDM's operations in Asia and especially in the U.S. were less than the profits it was generating and sharing with its HDM partners in Europe.

"The state of the [Dentsu-Y&R] union is good."

Alex Kroll

Eurocom pressured Y&R and Dentsu to make an acquisition to expand in New York but ended up buying HDM's European operations for $55 million.

Those operations are now part of Eurocom Advertising.

There are no immediate plans to increase the size of Lord, Dentsu & Partners through acquisitions, Mr. Burandt said.

"We have nothing planned at this time," he said. "Let's let the dust settle and see what we've got."

The restructuring was agreed to at a meeting last week that included Y&R Chairman-CEO Alex Kroll and Dentsu President-CEO Gohei Kogure.

Despite the strains Eurocom's complaints may have caused between the U.S. and Japanese ad giants, "the state of the union is good," Mr. Kroll said. "Dentsu is very supportive of the Dentsu-Young & Rubicam partnerships around the world."

Mr. Kroll noted the reorganization brings the Y&R name back to the Far East, where the joint venture is Y&R's only advertising operation.

The formation of Lord Dentsu effectively ends the saga of the six executives who walked out of WPP Group's Lord, Geller, Federico, Einstein in 1988 and were sued by WPP Chief Executive Martin Sorrell.

Of the six who formed Lord Einstein, only Lord Dentsu CEO Dick Lord remains with the surviving agency. Lord Einstein President Arthur Einstein is looking for a position, possibly with Y&R; Creative Director Kevin O'Neill last month joined Lintas:New York as group creative director; Chief Operating Officer C. Ray Freeman last year took a similar post at DCA, New York, a wholly owned Dentsu shop; Exec VP Edward Yaconetti left the industry; and Chief Financial Officer Louis Eichenholz is looking for a position with another agency.

Mr. Lord said about 40 of the 50 Lord Einstein staffers will move to Lord Dentsu. He said he hoped some of the others could be placed with other Y&R operations.

HDM Creative Directors Mark Hughes and Ron Arnold were named creative directors at Lord Dentsu's New York office; Los Angeles HDM Chairman Lee Koval will continue as creative director there. □

No. 1 Hasbro buys Tonka

By Kate Fitzgerald

Hasbro's acquisition of Tonka Corp. gives the No. 1-ranked toy company a sizable lead over No. 2 Mattel.

By absorbing financially troubled, No. 3-ranked Tonka, Hasbro adds such brands as Monopoly, Clue, Nerf and Play-Doh to an arsenal that already included such long-running hits as G.I. Joe, Milton Bradley board games and its PlaySkool division.

Sources in the $13 billion toy industry say Hasbro's annual sales are more than $1 billion; Tonka's sales are about $800 million, and together they significantly outdistance Mattel, whose sales are about $1 billion.

The deal was valued at $470 million.

The announcement came last week, just before the Feb. 11 opening of the American International Toy Fair. It adds to an uncertain market already hit by recession and the bankruptcy of major retailer Child World.

Troubled Tonka had expected a "substantial" fourth-quarter loss after a disastrous 1990 toy-selling season, and has been laboring under heavy debt from its own acquisition of Kenner Parker Toys in 1987.

"This is like a major trade in baseball where both teams come out ahead afterward," said David Leibowitz, a toy industry analyst with America[illegible] Securities. "Hasbro is broadening its already diverse lines by gaining a raft of excellent brand names, and Tonka is finally escaping from its financial problems.

The joint announcement came as a surprise to some industry observers, who had expected Mattel to emerge as Tonka's unnamed suitor after Tonka announced early last week it was having discussions about a possible sale.

"It was a shock to some people who were on the inside, although we all knew discussions were going back and forth," said Paul Kurnit, president of Griffin Bacal, New York, Hasbro's lead agency, which handles approximately $100 million in broadcast advertising.

"Everyone can see that this is a great move and a fantastic fit for Hasbro, particularly for its own continued leadership in the board games segment," Mr. Kurnit said.

The deal is contingent upon Hasbro's successful completion of a cash tender offer for Tonka's outstanding common stock and publicly held debt securities.

Both Hasbro and Tonka refused to comment on the deal or its effect on the toy marketers' agencies, but changes are almost inevitable, sources indicated last week.

Hasbro shuffled its agency assignments last year, consolidating its board game account at Griffin Bacal, along with all PlaySkool broadcast and most of Hasbro's boys' toys advertising.

Former Tonka agency Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor, which resigned that account in 1989 when it won several assignments from Hasbro, now handles most of Hasbro's girls' toys including its My Little Pony and Cabbage Patch lines, along with two new boys' toys to be unveiled at the Toy Fair. The account is estimated at $20 million to $25 million.

Last year, Tonka consolidated its $75 million domestic and $25 million international accounts at Grey Advertising. Earlier, separate agencies had handled Tonka's Kenner Products and Parker Bros. divisions. Kenner agency Grey added the Tonka brand account in 1989. Then last year, Tonka moved the $22 million Parker Bros. account to Grey from Della Femina, McNamee, Boston. □

Busch brands pair up in ads

By Ira Teinowitz

Anheuser-Busch, switching to a more contemporary approach, will use a "mountain man" theme for its first advertising jointly pitching Busch and Busch Light Draft beers.

The first two 30-second spots—breaking today and slated for network, cable and local airing—offer a series of urbane mountain men.

One commercial addresses the common misconception that the mountain man's best friend is his horse, and instead shows a young woman in that role.

The new campaign from DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, replaces Busch Light Draft's separate $8 million "Make the easy choice" campaign and the "Looking for a Busch" theme that's been part of the main brand's overall $9 million effort.

The 13-year-old "Head for the mountains" theme survives in spots that will run as an occasional secondary campaign. The line "Looking for a Busch" will also be used in some future "mountain man" spots.

Anheuser-Busch dispels common misconceptions about the "mountain man" in new spots uniting both Busch brands.

"What you see is an evolution," said Bill Braun, senior brand manager for the Busch brands. "It is a more contemporary, up-to-date portrayal of the Busch drinker."

Mr. Braun said the decision to combine Busch and Busch Light Draft advertising reflected a desire for efficiencies but not specifically cost efficiencies. The brands will spend more together this year than was spent separately last year, he said. Instead, having two campaigns, vs. three, will raise awareness levels, he said.

A-B spent $27.8 million in 1989 on Busch, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service. The brewer has contended that its switch from network to individual market advertising has resulted in understating its spending last year.

Busch, the nation's No. 5 brew, shipped 9.35 million barrels last year, up 2.7% from 1989, according to new figures released last week by Beer Marketer's Insights. Busch Light shipped about 2.1 million barrels, up from its 1989 test volume of 100,000. A-B tested Busch Light Draft in early 1989 and rolled it out to all areas where it sells Busch in January 1990. Busch beers are now sold in 46 states.

The latest shipment figures came as beer shipments grew a healthy 3.1% last year to 198.9 million barrels. (The figure includes non-alcohol beers and exports of 4 million barrels.)

The big winners last year were Miller Brewing Co.'s Miller Genuine Draft, which saw a 25.5% increase in volume to 5.9 million barrels and Adolph Coors Co.'s Coors Light, which saw a 12.4% growth to 11.8 million barrels. Bud Lite rose 9.3% to 11.8 million barrels and Milwaukee's Best (Miller) rose 4.5% to 7.0 million barrels.

Among the biggest losers was the Coors brand, down 16.5% to 4.3 million barrels. The brand has lost more than 50% of its barrelage in just three years. In 1987, Coors shipped 3.1 million barrels.

Also off was Miller High Life, whose pace of decline increased to 14% to 6.45 million barrels. A year ago, when High Life was down 7%, Miller officials had hoped the new "Give that man a Miller" campaign from Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, would slow High Life's decline. □

Don't desert 'mass'

In his Dec. 13 piece, Sid Bernstein makes the valid point that "mass" is still the key in marketing. This, in the face of the ever-more-aggressive efforts by marketers toward niche marketing narrowcasting, ZIP code mailing to psychographed audiences, etc. Why spend money sending your message to people who: A) Can't afford to buy your product? or B) Have a lifestyle that would make them shun your product?

Singling out the "non-prospects" has been enhanced to such a degree by the wizardry of our computer age that former mass marketers can now congratulate themselves not only on the money they've saved but on their communications link only with today's best customers and prospects.

But what about tomorrow?

The youngster, growing up in a family that can't afford the brand today, gets an education, a good job, a good income, a family, a new set of interests and thus becomes an ideal prospect for the brand he's never been exposed to.

On the other hand, hearing the brand's commercials and seeing the messages in print while still in the unable-to-buy category does not stop him from aspiring to buy when his circumstances change—as they're bound to.

Avoiding mass marketing is a form of elitism that owners of major brand franchises can ill afford.

'Time' top covers

The US magazine advertisement's claim that "Entertainment covers on Time outsell all others" (AA, Jan 7) is completely untrue. None of the best-selling issues in 1989 or 1990 carried entertainment covers. In 1989, the top five were "Planet of the Year," "World War II," "Barbara Bush," "Death by Gun" and "Trump." In 1990, the best-sellers were "Man of the Decade," "Twentysomething," "Talk of War," "Quayle" and "Iraq on the March." While these do not fit neatly into one category, it's obvious that hard news, Time's forte, sells best.

Retail increases not bad

On Jan. 7, Advertising Age concluded that retail sales were dismal. Well, I am not so sure.

The average of all sales increases for the stores reported in the piece was 10%. In this era of small increases in personal and disposable income, and increased retail competition in which retailers are battling more retailers for the smaller pot of money, smaller retail increases look pretty good. The rules of the game have changed, and same store comparisons are not what they meant 10 years ago for there is more retail competition. Retailers may have to settle for 3% increases. I know that I would not classify 10% average monthly increases in my salary as dismal and it's misleading to so classify it in retail.

Moreover, Wal-Mart's increases prove that there is market share and money to capture if you do what is right for the consumer. Dismal, yes—but only for retailers who don't understand that everything they do must revolve around their consumer.

Where marketers fail

I'm delighted that Sandoz's pricing director, Mick Kolassa, "agrees 100% with" my proposed 4Cs (Letters, AA, Dec 17). But I'm afraid I only agree 50% with his explanation for why people in marketing "fail to focus on" Consumer wants and needs, Cost to satisfy the need or want, Convenience to buy and Communication.

He's right that many educators fail to stress consumer orientation—partly, I submit, because the old 4Ps theory views the world from the company out. The other reason is that too many companies are so short-term-results-driven that they only care about moving product right now, this week, today. But's that's a subject for another article.

United Artists' sampling program (AA, Dec. 10) reminds me of a "Movie Bonus Bag" of samples for distribution in movie theaters that I worked on with Viacom back in 1975.

Negative ads don't all work

In your end-of-the-year retrospective (AA, Dec. 24), you reiterated your contention that "negative advertising . . . has become a staple of political campaigns [and], perhaps more significantly . . . it works." And you illustrated your point with the advertising of Jim Rappaport, who, despite a well-financed, viciously negative campaign during an anti-Dukakis, anti-incumbent, anti-liberal backlash here, was soundly defeated by the decidely weaker of Massachusetts' two U.S. senators.

The fact is that it is not negativity that "works." What works in political (or any) advertising campaign is the combination of a salable product and sound marketing strategy. Benefit selling—aggressive, yes, and sometimes comparative.

Negative campaign advertising leads to negative images of all of the candidates. We wind up electing the second-worst contender, and we lose faith in all of our elected officials as a result.

To be sure, some negative campaigns succeed; others fail miserably. We have prepared advertising for about two dozen campaigns and, while we don't win them all, have won a number against negative opponents.

To suggest that negative advertising works because it is common and because some candidates succeed with it is like suggesting that drunk driving "works" because so many people do it and a significant number of drunk drivers arrive home alive. Both suggestions are reckless, and reflect a rather shallow interpretation of the facts.

Volvo was different

All clients and advertising managers should have an opportunity to read the letter to the editor which attempts to justify the infractions of the now-infamous Volvo commercial by likening it to two other automotive commercials that may have been similarly deceptive (Letters, AA, Jan. 7). It's hard to believe that a communications professional would agree that these are all parallel cases or routine cases.

If the letter-writer is a consumer, and he sees no difference in these various ad techniques and messages, his comments serve as an important reminder that subtleties in communication are often lost on the general public and are one of the many reasons it is incumbent on advertising to be as clear as possible so as not to mislead or obfuscate.

We hope the advertising community is not as corrupt as the writer's somewhat pear-shaped observations would imply. Volvo clearly breached all ethical standards of responsible judgment by rigging a demonstration to thereby lend credibility to a core safety claim that is the foundation of the product's reputation. For this, there can be no justification. And that is why there "is such a commotion."

Five easy steps to crack market

Nisimblat sees ways to get around tight budgets

Marketer fear of the unfamiliar has kept some from entering the Hispanic market. Now tough budgetary situations have added yet another reason to bypass the segment.

Both are poor excuses, says Herney Nisimblat, director of Hispanic marketing at Colgate-Palmolive Co.

He offers the following guidelines for marketers to increase their confidence in approaching the segment—even on a shoestring budget.

■ "You don't have to go national. Think spot or local, instead."

With almost 35% of all U.S. Hispanics living in Los Angeles, New York and Miami, a limited placement can go a long way, he says.

"You can start with one market, test the waters and go from there," he says. "It's not so much a matter of cost, you have to learn."

■ Concerning costs, he advises marketers to negotiate with local stations. "Depending on the inventory they have available, you can work out a good deal."

■ Make sure you can prove the relative effectiveness of your efforts. Without the reams of scanner data marketers typically receive to support ad programs, many shy away from the Hispanic market's comparatively uncharted sales channels.

"Pick a market that's measurable vs. another brand or a competitor and get solid results to take back to management," he says. "If you do well, they'll keep your budget growing."

■ "Look at radio as an alternative," Mr. Nisimblat says. Production costs are low, so it's easier to put together a spot and spend your money on media, he says.

"Radio is much cheaper than TV," he says, while admitting "TV is still No. 1 in this market. For $1 million you can do an excellent program including network TV."

■ Consider non-media options. "There are many ways to get a brand involved in the community, communicate your message and show you support the community," Mr. Nisimblat says. □

Cosmetics, cereals, cars to take center stage

Spanish-language media sellers hunger for fresh entrees on their table. As Spanish-language media audience growth approaches maturity, executives such as Gary McBride, senior VP-sales and marketing at Telemundo Group, feel new-business development will take on an increasingly crucial role.

"We cannot look at a continued increase in audience share to build our revenues forever," he says.

Gene Bryan, VP-national sales manager of Katz Hispanic Radio, is making perhaps the most impassioned plea for bringing in new blood.

Failure to do so will result in loan foreclosure, he says.

"Even if you took all of the market's 1990 dollar growth and gave it all to one media company, that doesn't even help them service their debt," he says, noting Telemundo, Univision Network, Spanish Broadcasting System and other media companies are highly leveraged.

"If 7.6% [annual growth] is the trend," he adds, "those people investing millions are not going to see a return on their investment and meet bank requirements."

Those on the front lines of new-business development efforts at Spanish-language media say they'll be calling on companies in the following categories throughout the year:

■ Cosmetics, even though efforts to crack this category have stalled and category spending leader Maybelline Co. cut back in 1990.

■ Tourism, following Mexico's inaugural tourism campaign.

■ Mexican products, anticipating a windfall from the proposed free-trade agreement between the U.S. and Mexico that should facilitate cross-border marketing.

■ Telecommunications, primarily US Sprint and MCI Communications Corp., which are expected to challenge AT&T Co.

■ Domestic automakers, following higher spending among import advertisers, notably American Honda Motor Co., Mazda Motors of America and Nissan Motor Corp. USA.

■ Financial services, including credit cards, insurance, money transfer and banking services.

■ Confections—although Hershey Foods Corp., Nestle Foods Corp. and Mars Inc. are on Hispanic Business' Top 50 advertisers list already, they spend only $5 million combined on limited brands.

■ Cereals, with Kellogg Co. rumored to be making an introductory splash in the market this summer, triggering escalation in spending by General Mills, Ralston Purina Co. and Quaker Oats Co. □

Hispanic nets humming, 'Hooray for Hollywood'

By Marcy Magiera and Christy Fisher

The major Hollywood studios that drove the TV networks' upfront selling season will be a boon to Hispanic TV in 1991.

"We're looking for substantial increases from the movie industry," says Peter von Gal, VP-national sales, new-business development for Univision Network.

Mr. von Gal says he expects the "few million dollars a year in advertising" the studios spent last year with Univision will grow about 50% in 1991.

Telemundo Group executives echo the sentiment. Movie advertising has been one of its fastest-growing ad categories, going from "close to zero" in 1988 to $900,000 in 1990, says Gary McBride, senior VP-marketing and sales. Category spending in 1991 easily should surpass $1 million, he adds.

The eight major studios—Columbia Pictures Entertainment, Walt Disney Co., MGM/Pathe Entertainment, Orion Pictures Corp., Paramount Pictures Corp., Universal Pictures, Warner Bros. and 20th Century Fox Film Corp.—all advertise, to varying extents, on Spanish-language TV.

Observers say this year the studios will advertise a broader range of films than the action and horror movies traditionally promoted to Hispanics.

"What movies are good for the Hispanic market? All of them," says Santiago Pozo, president of Hispanic agency Arenas Group and former manager of special markets at Universal. He says studio executives think Hispanics are interested only in films with Hispanic themes or characters, but any film of interest to the general population can do well in the market.

A 1988 study commissioned by Telemundo found that 50% of Hispanics usually see comedy films, which, unlike adventure films, require a greater command of English.

Recently Disney used Hispanic media to promote the comedy "Three Men and a Little Lady" and the animated film "The Rescuers Down Under."

Another reason for the additional activity is the studios now realize Hispanic moviegoers are bilingual.

The Telemundo study reported that 84% of all movies attended by Hispanics are in English. A recent Hispanic TV spot for Orion's "Eve of Destruction" featured a Spanish-language voice-over and a clip in which actor Gregory Hines speaks in English.

"On a [cost-per-thousand] basis, ethnic media has always been very attractive," says Alan Dinwiddie, VP-special markets for Walt Disney Co.'s Buena Vista Pictures Marketing unit.

But some studios are split over whether bilingual capabilities make Spanish-language advertising an effective buy.

Despite advertising "Eve of Destruction," Beverly Weinstein, VP-media at Orion, says she needs more research to assess Hispanic media's efficiency. The studio is looking for answers to questions concerning which theaters Hispanics attend and identifying differences in movie-going patterns between Hispanic consumers in various income levels.

"What we are aiming to do in 1991 is get a better understanding of the market," Ms. Weinstein says.

Despite the questions over efficiency, Hispanic agencies representing studios expect a big year from these clients.

Luis Bouroncle, president of Hispanic Entertainment Specialists, estimates his clients—including Warner Bros., Universal, Columbia and Disney—will place a combined total of $4 million in Hispanic TV, up about 33% from 1989. Recent releases handled by Mr. Bouroncle's agency include Universal's "Kindergarten Cop" and "Problem Child."

This also may be the year comprehensive Spanish-language movie marketing campaigns replace scattered print and TV buys.

Campaigns for Disney releases eventually will include publicity, promotions and ads. The studio intends to go beyond "just buying some spots" on the Spanish-language networks, Mr. Dinwiddie says, who Disney hired from Uniworld Advertising, New York, six months ago to coordinate ethnic marketing.

"The fact that I'm here says we're going to do a lot more than just look at [ethnic advertising]," he says. □

In a shift from pushing action and horror films, studios now are promoting comedies such as "Kindergarten Cop" and "Problem Child" to Hispanics.

Autos gain top ad awareness

By Kate Fitzgerald

Automobiles rolled to the top of Advertising Age's adWatch survey in December, taking the top three spots for the first time.

Automobiles in general placed No. 1 in the monthly survey of advertising awareness, up from No. 4 in November, when the category as a whole tied with Chevrolet.

Ford was up one notch to second place, followed by Chevrolet in third.

Most major automobile marketers maintained their advertising levels in December, after breaking new campaigns last fall. However, General Motors Corp. and Chrysler were among a handful of auto advertisers to add fuel-economy messages to their TV spots in response to rising consumer fuel prices.

McDonald's was No. 4 in the survey, followed by Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser and Pepsi-Cola, which tied for fifth place. Coca-Cola and Toyota tied for No. 7.

Eveready Battery Co.'s persistent pink bunny character helped its Energizer brand remain among the top 10, where it placed No. 9 on the strength of its fourth-quarter campaign.

AT&T and grocery stores in general tied for 10th.

In aided awareness, mentions of Ralston Purina Co. in the pet food category increased significantly in December. Alpo led the category with 15.4%; Purina was second with 11.8%; Purina Puppy Chow, third with 3%; Carnation Co.'s Friskies, fourth with 2.2%; and Purina Dog Chow, fifth with 2.1%.

In the tire category, Bridgestone appeared among the top 5 for the first time in a year. Goodyear led the category with 22.5%; Michelin was second with 21.1%; Firestone, third with 7.1%; BFGoodrich, fourth with 2.7%; and Bridgestone and General Tire tied for fifth with 1.1%.

AdWatch is a joint project of Advertising Age and the Gallup Organization. Ad awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample to name the first advertising that comes to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days. In December, 1,000 adults were polled by phone. The survey's margin of error is plus or minus 3.1%. □

McD value pitch rolls

OAK BROOK, Ill.—McDonald's Corp. this month will complete the national rollout of its Real Value Menu.

"You'll love the change" is the TV tagline being used in markets where the price reduction strategy is already in place. The "Food, folks and fun" umbrella theme continues, while "Good food. Good value" is being used for selected brand-image spots.

Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, created the advertising.

Chairman Michael R. Quinlan said the strategy is "not discounting but a coordinated program of lower pricing and meal combinations that are a value to our customers, and also good for McDonald's."

He also said he's "thrilled so far" with response to the 91% fat-free Lean Deluxe hamburger patty now in test.

"And if I'm thrilled with it, chances are we may do more with it," he said. □

ADREVIEW

Wartime patriotism makes for maudlin ads

By Bob Garfield

Garfield

Wartime patriotic fervor has provoked all sorts of repugnant behavior, from Arab baiting to gas mask chic to the unseemly spectacle of soldiers' children on Super Bowl halftime display, trotted out like so many carnival freaks, enticing millions of TV viewers to feel good about feeling bad.

It is at such times that advertising is typically on the leading edge of American culture, showing the world, in moments of crisis, just how shallow and maudlin we can be.

Curiously, in the midst of Desert Storm, Madison Avenue has been remarkably restrained. But of course there have been some advertisers that simply have not been able to resist. In the Persian Gulf: The Mother of All Battles. On the home front: The Mother of All Bathos.

Print ads for Kent, Newport and True cigarettes, for instance, now will carry little yellow stripes in one corner, according to Lorillard Chairman Andrew Tisch, "to show our support for the troops."

In the genre of war-related advertising, spots from Boeing Co. (l.) and Protection One exhibit good and bad taste, respectively.

Yep, God willing, every one of our soldiers, sailors and airmen will come back alive, so Lorillard can recommence killing them. Like most yellow-ribbon advertising, while the effort is no doubt grounded in the best of intentions, it is not apt to have the best of results.

Anheuser-Busch, via D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis, has rerun a 6-year-old, 60-second patriotic paean called "Here's to You, America." The syrupy montage of bald eagles, Clydesdales, steel mill employees, gold medalists and our men in uniform isn't a major thematic departure; the brewer owns the American working class, and the jingoist world view thereof, and therefore flag waving has long been part of its advertising message.

But in the context of Gulf hostilities, it is too much. What used to be merely an overly ardent tribute to good ol' American quality now has an offensive subtext: War is hell. Drink Bud.

That commercial ran on the Super Bowl, which was venue to another all-American adverexcess from another all-American advertiser: Coca-Cola USA.

With Diet Pepsi's mammoth 800 number phone-in promotion scuttled by fears of overloading phone circuits, Diet Coke apparently had been handed a huge tactical advantage in the Cola Wars. But Coca-Cola would have no part of it. Out went funny Leslie Nielsen spots and in came a somber exercise in public handwringing, complete with funereal voice-over:

"Prior to the Middle East crisis, we had planned to run a promotional commercial today called 'Crack the Code for Real Refreshment.' But with our servicemen and women in the Persian Gulf, we feel it would be inappropriate to run our lighthearted commercial at this time." Oh, please.

Was this really a sudden crisis of conscience in Atlanta, or did Coca-Cola USA fear being bested by PepsiCo in the War Effort Sweepstakes? Was this corporate sensitivity, or corporate grandstanding?

Leslie Nielsen cracking jokes is not inappropriate. What is inappropriate is the morbid wallowing in prospective grief. Far from supporting our troops, the dismal tone must be thoroughly demoralizing, bespeaking emotional breakdown on the home front, playing directly into the enemy's psychological warfare hand.

Obviously, death in the Gulf helps put soft drinks and pro sports and TV commercials into perspective —but then, so does death in the violence-torn inner city, on the highways, in the AIDS wards and everywhere else. Life, however, goes on. There is no need to rend the social fabric. The rape of Kuwait is bad enough. Why should we allow ourselves to be Saddamized?

At worst, yellow-ribbon advertising represents base opportunism, exploiting the danger to our armed forces and the anguish of our nation. At best, it is a gratuitous gesture, a sort of heart-on-your-sleeve sanctimony that, by belaboring the obvious, devalues the sentiment behind it.

One prominent exception is a handsome spot from Boeing Co. and Cole & Weber, Seattle: another reprise of another patriotic montage, but more stylishly, subtly executed and minus the implicit sales pitch. To the lyrics of an obscure stanza of "America the Beautiful" we see scene after scene of our armed forces in action, followed by a simple vote of thanks.

Since no viewer is being asked to run down to Boeing to buy a 757 or a C5A, the company's motives, like its message, appear pure.

But then, also from the Pacific Northwest, comes a regional spot called "War Story." It opens, amid much commotion, in what looks like a military command center.

"There's a war going on," the announcer says.

What kind of war? A war on crime. The spot, from Marx/Knoll, Denight & Dodge, Portland, Ore., for a company called Protection One, advertises burglar alarms. □

New Champagne gems get $5M push

By Cleveland Horton

Recession notwithstanding, a new class of diamonds is about to be introduced to the U.S.

Argyle Diamonds of West Perth, Australia, which produces about one-third of the world's diamonds, plans a $5 million marketing effort to spark interest in colored gems.

The marketing effort is thought to be the largest in the jewelry industry apart from DeBeers Consolidated Mines and the World Gold Council, says Team One, El Segundo, Calif., which won the account early this year. A unit of Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, Team One specializes in marketing premium products and services.

Argyle has trademarked the name Champagne Diamond to distinguish the colored gems from the better-known white variety. The colored diamonds are further classified in seven color ranges from light champagne to cognac.

Argyle commissioned a study last year to determine consumer interest in the colored jewels. The results noted a strong potential for the stones, particularly in settings that feature contrasting shades of diamonds.

The company says the jewelry will retail for between $800 and $4,000.

A trade campaign starts this month to introduce the Champagne Diamonds, promoting their country of origin. An intensive consumer campaign will follow in mid- to late summer. □

Car ad cuts

deadline for Iraq to pull its troops out of Kuwait.

For the Jan. 11-20 period, sales of U.S.-built vehicles fell 25.5%, compared with a year ago, to 191,029, according to Automotive News.

Several sources familiar with dealer vehicle orders said last week those orders were running as much as 50% behind year-earlier levels, a reflection of the lack of showroom traffic as consumers worry about the war and recession.

The marketing cutbacks might be short-lived if automakers start to see more opportunity in the market, said Jim Wangers, senior managing partner at Automotive Marketing Consultants.

"The industry is coming off a bad year. Coupled with the uncertainty of consumers, everybody's on the fence, including the imports," he said.

Regional dealer ad group spending, most of which goes into local broadcasting stations, is also slowing because of the sales slump.

Most dealers contribute to those funds on the basis of shipments they receive from the factory, paying either a fixed amount or a percentage of invoice per each vehicle, said Mike Strong, president of Strong Automotive Merchandising, a Birmingham, Ala., agency that handles 33 dealer ad groups and eight individual dealers.

One note of encouragement, Mr. Strong said, is that "individual dealers already have hit the bottom of the trough, and they have come back promoting."

He said dealers still believe pent-up demand will drive up sales after uncertainty about the war's impact comes to an end.

GM agency executives are resigned to the reduced ad spending but worry it will cost market share, especially to Japanese brands.

"If you lose share of voice, there's always the concern you could lose ground that you won't be able to get back," said one agency official.

One reason GM ad budgets aren't set in concrete is that the corporation is giving divisions more flexibility in allocating overall marketing expenses, said a divisional marketing executive.

Money for consumer incentives, such as rebates, is being lumped with funds for advertising and promotional programs.

The divisions can largely determine how to allocate the funds among marketing programs and will have some ability during the year to shift from one program to another.

GM President Lloyd Reuss said recently the company's marketing costs had reached $1,200 per vehicle, including the cost of consumer incentives. That would put GM's total marketing expenditures at nearly $6 billion in 1990.

Cadillac ad spending apparently won't be trimmed from its estimated $90 million level in 1990 because of fierce competition in the luxury segment and the crucial fall introductions of the new Seville and Eldorado models.

"This will be the time for us to step out very dramatically," said Peter Levin, director of advertising for Cadillac.

Though he declined to disclose ad spending plans, Jay Qualman Jr., Buick's general director of advertising, said "it looks like a challenging year." □

Sugar sales turning sour

Retail dollar sales of tabletop sweeteners are slowing down. Total volume increased a meager 3% in 1990 to $2.5 billion; 1989 sales were up 7.5% from the year before. Here's how the three main segments fared in sales.

TV's upfront: Caution

By Wayne Walley

Network TV's upfront market, normally a frenzy of buying activity, won't be the same this year.

Many people predict a significantly softer marketplace in the early-summer period when advertisers make buying commitments for the 1991-92 prime-time season.

Caution is the buzzword.

"The upfront is a gigantic crapshoot," said an executive of a major network advertiser who asked to remain anonymous. "Sometimes you are right on and you buy exactly what you need. [In last year's upfront for the current TV season] we bought too much. . . . We will be much more cautious."

KIMBERLY MART

Although this kind of early talk is often dismissed by buyers and sellers as rhetoric and "bargaining in the press," the sober fact is that few ad budgets are likely to grow in 1991.

"I haven't heard of anyone who's spending a large amount of money, and there aren't a lot of introductions of new products on the horizon," the advertiser said.

War jitters and an uncertain economy, coupled with the continued bargains available in the

Kraft, Campbell on health kick

New food items take on ConAgra

By Julie Liesse and Judann Dagnoli

Kraft General Foods and Campbell Soup Co. are targeting ConAgra's popular Healthy Choice brand in what looks like a game of catch-up in the food industry.

As ConAgra tests Healthy Choice line extensions in a variety of product categories, No. 1 food marketer Kraft General Foods is ready to test a broad line of "foods for healthier eating" called Kraft Alternatives.

Campbell, burned by Healthy Choice's success in frozen meals, is restaging its LeMenu LightStyle as LeMenu Healthy dinners.

Kraft USA's Kraft Alternatives line starts market-testing this month and is clearly patterned after Healthy Choice, even though the products don't directly compete with that brand as yet.

Not only will the new Kraft products pitch an umbrella nutritional concept but the unifying packaging is green—the Healthy Choice color that's apparently becoming the standard for new nutritional foods.

The 10-item Alternatives line offers products low in calories, cholesterol and fat in six of Kraft's biggest categories—representing food sales of about $6 billion—and appear in multiple areas of the supermarket.

ConAgra's avowed goal with Healthy Choice is to expand to categories throughout the supermarket.

Kraft Alternatives' four dairy products include cream cheese, cheese slices similar to Kraft Singles American cheese and a mozzarella chunk cheese, while a table spread will compete in the margarine category.

In the dry grocery aisles, Kraft Alternatives will offer a Miracle Whip-type spoon-

FDA order halts P&G, Colgate toothpaste intros

By Jennifer Lawrence and Judann Dagnoli

Procter & Gamble Co. and Colgate-Palmolive Co. are racing to get the next generation of "super protection" toothpastes to market, but the Food & Drug Administration has called timeout.

P&G, on the brink of introducing Ultra Protection Crest, learned last week the product is likely to be delayed for at least two years because the FDA has determined the toothpaste's active ingredient—triclosan—is a new drug.

The new Crest formula is said to fight gum disease.

The halt order is a dramatic and embarrassing blow to P&G, since the marketer had already presented the product to the retail trade. An estimated $32 million ad campaign from D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, to support the launch has been scrapped.

The anti-bacterial triclosan must undergo the FDA's new-drug application process, which can take from 24 to 36 months to complete, once the supporting data have been filed.

The FDA's position on triclosan also appears to be a setback for Colgate, the leader in the $3 bil-

HOLLY SEGUINE

By Raymond Serafin and Cleveland Horton

A swelling of patriotic sentiment appears to be boosting consumer consideration of domestic cars.

That trend could be accentuated by a possible political backlash against Japan and Germany over their limited roles in the allied effort in the Persian Gulf War.

Two separate surveys suggest Americans look upon U.S. car brands more favorably now than they did before U.S. troops arrived in the Gulf last August. The surveys were conducted by Integrated Automotive Resources, a marketing consultancy, and BBDO Worldwide, New York, whose Detroit area office handles Chrysler Corp.'s Dodge division.

Whether the sentiment translates into any lasting market-share changes remains to be seen.

It may turn out that favorable consideration for U.S. products is at its peak precisely when most people are putting off shopping for new vehicles because of economic uncertainties exacerbated by the war.

Also, any attempt by the U.S. competitors to tie the flag to their products would be viewed by many consumers as cynical opportunism.

Volkswagen U.S. is "cognizant of the trend, and we're watching it carefully," said Ron Dusenberry, manager of advertising.

In recent VW focus groups, consumers have spontaneously raised the issue of the Japanese role in world affairs, Mr. Dusenberry said.

"They're not necessarily hostile, but you get the idea they are going to be watching and interpreting events," he said.

VW has no plans to shift away from emphasizing its German heritage in its "Fahrvergnugen" ad campaign, Mr. Dusenberry said, describing any such move as an overreaction. DDB Needham Worldwide, New York and Troy, Mich., created the campaign.

He suggested VW is less at risk than Japanese brands or luxury

Volvo makes shift

Pay plan tied to sales helps Messner

By Raymond Serafin and Jon Lafayette

A compensation proposal tied to Volvo's future performance helped Messner Vetere Berger Carey Schmetterer, New York, win a three-way contest for the $40 million Volvo Cars of North America account.

The agency's creative pitch played a big part, too, by communicating Volvo's traditional ad themes of safety, reliability, durability and value "in very compelling, human ways," said Bob Austin, manager of public relations and one of six Volvo executives involved in the final review.

■ O&M keeps Hardee's account—Page 46.

The agency's work won't break until sometime after April 1, when it officially takes over from Scali, McCabe, Sloves. Scali resigned last November after revelations cars had been rigged for a product demonstration commercial in which a "monster" pickup truck failed to crush a Volvo.

William Hoover, Volvo's senior VP-marketing, called agency President Bob Schmetterer on Feb. 6 to say, "Welcome back." Mr. Schmetterer worked for Volvo as market research director starting in 1967 and in 1971 moved to Scali, where he was managing director of the Volvo account.

The other finalists were Altschiller Reitzfeld/Tracy-Locke and Rosenfeld, Sirowitz, Humphrey & Strauss.

Each agency prepared a national image campaign and a regional market support program, with Volvo reimbursing each up to $15,000 for expenses.

Volvo considered the quality of research, formulation of strategy, application of Greening of NAD?

ANA seeks guidelines from self-regulatory arm

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—The ad industry's scramble to develop environmental marketing guidelines took a new twist last week when the Association of National Advertisers asked the industry's self-regulatory arm to consider issuing green guidelines.

The ANA's request to the National Advertising Division of the Council of Better Business Bureaus comes as the Federal Trade Commission this week is expected to receive a similar request from a group of major marketers and trade associations, including the ANA (AA, Feb. 4).

The same industry-drafted petition will form the basis for the request to NAD, said ANA President DeWitt Helm Jr.

Mr. Helm acknowledged he expects some critics to charge that the decision to go to NAD is an attempt to keep government out of the advertising guidelines business. But he said advertisers are so anxious for environmental guidelines that going to NAD will save time.

"We already have met with the FTC, and they see this as compatible," Mr. Helm said. "But, knowing that there is bureaucracy everywhere, hopefully the NAD can move more quickly in this regard than the FTC likely will. I'd like to see the NAD's eventual guidelines to be so well thought of and developed that all the FTC would have to do would be to use them as their own."

The ANA's request already has the endorsement of the American Advertising Federation and likely will win support from the American Association of Advertising Agencies, Mr. Helm said. He also said he expected the support of Jim McIlhenney, president of the Council of Better Business Bureaus. Mr. McIlhenney wasn't available for comment.

In addition to saving time, a set of guidelines issued by NAD would provide a road map to avoid regulatory pitfalls. State attorneys general remain active in monitoring green marketing, Mr. Helm noted, and there's no guarantee the FTC won't ulti-

Breezer breathes life into liquors

By Patricia Winters

Bacardi Imports' Bacardi Breezer, introduced nationally last April, has shocked competitors, retailers and industry analysts with a phenomenol sales record at a time when liquor sales are declining.

Case sales hit 3.95 million last year, according to figures from John C. Maxwell Jr., analyst with Wheat, First Securities.

Even more amazing is that the low-alcohol, rum-based cooler with fruit juices racked up its gains as wine coolers continued a precipitous decline, Mr. Maxwell said.

One source, Jobson Publishing Co., publisher of "Jobson's Liquor Handbook," said Breezer is now the No. 3 liquor brand behind leader Bacardi rum and Heublein's second-ranked Smirnoff vodka.

Bacardi Breezer also may go down in liquor industry lore as the brand that broke the barriers of liquor marketing.

"They've been able to advertise [Breezer] in places that they couldn't before," said Gail Zelitzky, president of Foremost Sales Promotions, a unit of the 300-unit national Foremost Liquor store chain.

Bacardi has advertised Breezer on TV and radio even though the product is a distilled spirit. Bacardi convinced the Distilled Spirits Council of America in 1988 to ease its self-imposed industry ban on broadcast advertising for spirit-based coolers with an alcohol content of 7% or less.

Bacardi Breezer's alcohol content is 4% by volume, equivalent to most beers and wine coolers.

The TV networks still refuse spirit-based products, though they allow local affiliates to decide for themselves, so Breezer last year got spot TV and spot radio support in addition to print and outdoor.

This year, Bacardi Breezer w[illegible] an $18 million advertising and promotion campaign, complete with a national concert-tour sponsorship. A network radio campaign will be included for the first time.

McCaffrey & McCall, New York, handles the brand.

Bacardi Breezer became one of the hot liquor brands in 1990 partly because of TV advertising.

Keeping Breezer from being a passing fad is a big challenge for Bacardi in 1991.

Breezer could be another peach schnapps, which saw sales skyrocket in the mid-'80s and then take a nose-dive, Mr. Maxwell said.

"A lot of times it's just the kids that think it's a wonderful thing and then after they have their fun, they go on to the next thing," he said.

To prevent that, Bacardi this week will Group's TV spending clout increases in Ad Age regular report tracking media expenditures

THE TOP 200 BRANDS

AT&T leads in brand spending

By R. Craig Endicott

AT&T Co. continued to conquer media spending heights, priming its arsenal of products and services with $371.6 million in advertising in the first three quarters of 1990.

The company's 58.9% increase in spending over the same period a year earlier outdistanced all other advertised brand names in the U.S. in Advertising Age's Top 200 Brands listing.

McDonald's Corp. was second at $334.7 million, up 5.8% from the first three quarters of 1989. That puts it within striking distance of AT&T when full-year 1990 data are published May 20 by AA.

AT&T applied media tonnage in particular to network, spot and syndicated TV, backing long-distance lines with $121.5 million for the three-quarter cumulative.

AT&T rival MCI Communications Corp. was No. 90 among the Top 200 brands; US Sprint was No. 58.

AA calculates the Top 200 brands each quarter from nine-media, year-to-date totals provided by LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service.

A "brand" is every product or service marketed under the same name. A brand's ad total can cross LNA/Arbitron-designated subclasses, but brand advertising totals in this ranking include only amounts from those subclasses where spending exceeded $1.5 million.

As a group, the 200, ranging from AT&T's high to No. 200 Arby's restaurants at $21.3 million, claimed 38.3% of the $28.7 billion in advertising spent in the first three quarters by 39,000 brands monitored by LNA/Arbitron.

The 200's media presence claimed 62.5% of all network TV spending, up from 57.5% a year earlier; 33.2% of spot TV, up from 30.9%; and 56.9% of syndicated TV, up from 44.8%.

Renewed third-quarter spending by the Top 200 in consumer magazines kept year-to-year dollar movement in that ad-starved medium in the black. After a 4.1% decline in first-half magazine spending, the 200 boosted their third-quarter magazine outlays 22.7% from the same period in 1989, to elevate all category spending 2.6% for three quarters.

The Top 200 brands accounted for 30% of magazine advertising in that third quarter.

While talk of a recession surfaced in the third quarter, it didn't materialize in media spending. All nine monitored media showed year-to-year increases for the third quarter.

Automobiles, claiming 21% of the Top 200's ad volume, provided a big third-quarter ad stimulus of $706 million, up 45%, to produce a three-quarter cume of $2.3 billion.

The automotive category, consisting of 28 brands, accounted for 38% of the Top 200's ad growth for the quarter.

On a year-to-year basis, spending by foreign auto marketers rose 23.7%, while domestic producers registered an 8.4% advance.

Retailers, the second-largest category, claimed ad spending of $1.19 billion for the three quarters, up 13%. Sears, Roebuck & Co. led retailers at $297.3 million, up 9.5%.

Among retailers, only Campeau Corp.'s No. 170 Bloomingdale's stores and R.H. Macy & Co.'s No. 21 Macy's stores reduced advertising.

Advertising for food—the third-largest group at $1.13 billion from 19 brands—rose 15.6% for the three quarters. Nearly 34% of the category ad volume, or $385 million, was attributed to the nation's largest advertiser for all brands, Philip Morris Cos.

Philip Morris had five food brands on the 200 chart, led by No. 9 Kraft foods.

With 10 brands on the list, the most of any 200 parent, Philip Morris backed its brands with $664.3 million to edge General Motors Corp.'s $632.5 million, supporting seven brands.

Procter & Gamble Co., the nation's second-largest advertiser when all brands are included, backed nine brands with $318.1 million, up 29.4%, but finished eighth among parents of the 200.

The method of ranking by cumulative ad volume may minimize the impact of seasonal ad spending on the list's makeup, but it couldn't stop the summer sun from heating up some budgets.

Of the 12 newcomers to crack the list, most carried seasonal ad luggage. Their leader was Reebok International's Reebok shoes and sportswear at No. 130. Anheuser-Busch's Michelob beers re-entered the list, after a quarterly hiatus, at No. 165.

Thompson Medical Co.'s Ultra Slim-Fast diet products placed 46th. The brand's 314.4% ad growth led all other brands in year-to-year percentage growth.

Chrysler Corp.'s Eagle, No. 128 in first-half advertising, spent only $100,000 in the third quarter to drop from the three-quarter cume. □

Cautious upfront

network scatter market, all point toward scaled-back upfront spending. Scatter refers to the remaining time, sold after advertisers commit to time allocated by the networks for upfront.

Some network inventory is selling for as much as 30% below upfront pricing during the current scatter market, while some network time sold for half upfront costs during the fourth quarter.

"There are too many imponderables," said Allen Banks, exec VP-media director for Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York. "No one is bullish now, and no one knows if you can afford to be bullish later. Clients want to play it as close to the vest for as long as possible. Flexibility is what is important to clients right now."

Most industry experts predict a 10% to 15% decline in prime-time upfront spending for 1991-92 with total sales at about $3.5 billion to $3.7 billion, lower than it's been in the past two years.

Last year, upfront spending set a record of $4.3 billion—barely topping the previous year's $4.2 billion—when automakers poured almost $700 million into upfront.

But some expect enough severe upfront cutbacks by key advertisers to drop the total to lower than it's been in four years—as low as $3 billion—despite a potential influx of ad spending related to the Winter and Summer Olympics.

"Historically, Olympics spending came out of corporate budgets, but things are different now," said a media buyer who requested anonymity. "The Olympics will siphon money out of brand budgets, and they will get the money back by taking it out of upfront dollars."

Most people believe some network dayparts, such as children's Saturday morning, late night, news and daytime, will fare well in upfront sales while both network prime time and sports will suffer.

"There may not be enough money in the marketplace to sell out prime time," said Steve Auerbach, senior VP-director of network programming for Ally & Gargano. "The same is true for sports."

"The way people approach the upfront will be different this year, and it could create a new order in buying and selling," said Chuck Bachrach, senior VP-director of network and programming for Rubin Postaer & Associates, Los Angeles. "The networks will have to readjust because of the financial impact of the war. Some categories will want to move upfront and others will wait for scatter."

Network executives, scrambling to drum up first-quarter scatter business and trying to find clients to buy what could be a glut of second-quarter time, dismissed discussion of the upfront selling season as "premature."

Some buyers believe the networks will have to make a few "sacrifice deals," packages with significantly lower prices than last year for a few clients to get the market going.

Others say the networks could simply keep costs per thousand equal to last year to encourage upfront spending and then increase inventory and revenues by adding extra spots within network shows.

"The agencies will say they will not pay increases this year, but the networks can't live with that. Adding inventory is one way to generate more money when you only get minuscule increases," said an agency media buyer who asked to be unidentified. "They've already asked producers to cut 30 seconds or 60 seconds from shows for war updates, so why not use the time for commercials? The producers have to cut the shows down for syndication anyway."

ABC, CBS and NBC have taken the most heat from agencies, advertisers and the public for commercial clutter on TV, but the current network-imposed limit of 7 minutes of commercials per hour of programming is stricter than the 12 to 14 minutes of commercials per hour on some cable networks and the estimated 8 minutes of commercial time in half-hour syndicated shows.

The specter of the war is a key to how the networks will react.

Should the war be prolonged, chances are the upfront market could be delayed or severely curtailed to accommodate advertisers. Buyers will likely demand and could conceivably get more flexibility in upfront commitments, too.

"People are using the war as an alibi, but it's amplified the economic situation," said Kal Leibowitz, president of KSL Media, New York. "People want to buy as close to air date or promotional date as possible if it is a firm deal."

To generate scatter sales, the networks are also offering advertisers regional buys, meaning anything could happen when upfront negotiations start.

The situation doesn't bode well for alternative TV media, including cable, syndication and spot TV.

"If you can buy a 10 rating on network TV at the same CPM as a 0.5 rating on a cable network, why take the smaller rating?" Ally's Mr. Auerbach asked. □ lion worldwide toothpaste market but No. 2 in the U.S. behind P&G.

Colgate had planned on using its own new Colgate Gum Protection Formula, which also contains triclosan, as a platform to strengthen its share position in the $1 billion domestic market and had discussions with the FDA about the product early last year (AA, April 23).

Both P&G and Colgate market triclosan-containing toothpastes outside the U.S. Colgate Gum Protection Formula, sold in 23 countries, accounts for a 6% share of the worldwide toothpaste market, said Andrew Shore, analyst with Prudential-Bache Securities.

Sources familiar with the situation say Colgate had taken steps last year to get approval to make anti-plaque claims for its toothpaste. But Colgate hasn't asked the FDA for formal new-drug approval for the use of triclosan in its toothpaste, said Richard Chastonay, director of the FDA's division of drug labeling compliance.

Colgate didn't return phone calls last week seeking comment. Young & Rubicam, New York, is the Colgate toothpaste agency.

P&G had told retailers Ultra Protection Crest had been clinically shown to kill bacteria, a leading cause of gum disease, and the product was positioned as an "anti-plaque toothpaste," said one retailer.

Teri Glover, a P&G spokeswoman, said Ultra Protection Crest was positioned as "an innovative new product" that offers cavity protection and tartar control as well as fighting bacteria, resulting in a "cleaner mouth."

P&G had gone ahead with its sell-in to the retail trade because it didn't believe a new-drug application process would be necessary since product claims were cosmetic rather than therapeutic, Ms. Glover said. Further, the fact that triclosan toothpaste is marketed extensively outside the U.S. made the new-drug status seem unlikely, she added.

However, "The FDA felt that the addition of triclosan in any oral-care product, regardless of the claims, should be made through the new-drug application process," Ms. Glover said.

She said the company is still discussing the triclosan issue with the FDA, but she declined to comment on whether data have been filed to start the process.

Unilever U.S.' Chesebrough-Pond's unit is skirting the edges of the issue with the rollout of Close-Up Anti-Plaque toothpaste and mouth rinse, which are now starting sell-in to retailers.

The active ingredient in Close-Up Anti-Plaque is stannous fluoride, a widely used ingredient approved long ago by the FDA, a Chesebrough spokeswoman said. She said the brand "stops the bacterial growth and inhibits adhesion [of bacteria] on the surface of the tooth," which she classified as "a cosmetic claim that doesn't need FDA approval."

But the FDA has traditionally viewed plaque-fighting claims as therapeutic rather than cosmetic, and it's not known what view the government agency will have on Close-Up Anti-Plaque.

A national TV, print and radio campaign is expected to break later this month from J. Walter Thompson USA, New York. □ able dressing and five pourable salad dressings.

Kraft

Kraft Alternatives will go into Information Resources Inc.'s BehaviorScan system in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and Midland, Texas.

"The key here is the identification of a broad consumer issue, in terms of interest in nutritional products," said Bob San Filippo, brand manager on the project at Kraft. "The Alternatives line will be the consumer's assurance of a significant reduction in fat, cholesterol and calories."

Development of Kraft Alternatives has been a closely guarded project. J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago, has the potentially huge assignment; executives at other Kraft agencies claimed to be unaware of the brand. TV and print advertising will support the line.

One TV commercial targeted at consumers 45 and older will offer "a dramatization of the consumer confusion over product claims and how to pick out products that meet all their nutritional needs," Mr. San Filippo said.

Some of that confusion is reflected in Kraft's own lineup.

Last year, Kraft established a Kraft Free moniker for fat-free foods in several categories, including three of the Kraft Alternatives categories. The company already has three pourable salad dressing lines: the regular Kraft brand, a reduced-calories version and Kraft Free products.

Although all the Alternatives products are low in cholesterol and fat, some are cholesterol- and fat-free. Kraft General Foods' existing fat-free products—ranging from Entenmann's pastries to Sealtest ice cream—posted sales of $350 million in 1990.

"Our Free products are doing very well, but there seems to be an opportunity for this second line of products," Mr. San Filippo said, referring to Alternatives.

Mr. San Filippo wouldn't comment on whether Kraft General Foods is considering the Alternatives name for other product categories or divisions.

Kraft General Foods' frozen products division is testing Eating Right, a line of frozen entrees low in calories, fat and sodium, and also marketing Budget Gourmet Light & Healthy frozen dinners.

Frozen meals is where ConAgra's Healthy Choice has had its greatest success. But Campbell was out of the gate first with LeMenu LightStyle in 1986, although it was positioned as low-calorie rather than healthy.

"LightStyle had the first national 'healthy' ad campaign [for a frozen dinner line] with our 'Eat smarter' campaign two years ago," said Jim Van Stone, Campbell VP-convenience meals sector. "But LightStyle was perceived as a diet product rather than a healthy product."

To transform LightStyle into LeMenu Healthy and make it more competitive with Healthy Choice, Campbell has reduced the sodium levels in all 21 varieties. Few other adjustments were necessary, Mr. Van Stone said.

"The key here is the identification of a broad consumer issue, in terms of interest in nutritional products."

Mr. Van Stone said the company will hike brand spending to $10 million to $12 million, from $7 million. Creative hasn't been decided; Ogilvy & Mather, New York, handles.

The package will eschew Healthy Choice's signature green.

"We're continuing with our blue color because we don't want to alienate our existing franchise," Mr. Van Stone said.

He said Campbell has a good chance of catching up with Healthy Choice. LeMenu and LeMenu LightStyle ended 1990 with a combined 5.5% share of the $3.9 billion frozen dinner/entree market. Healthy Choice had 8.2%, according to IRI's InfoScan service.

ConAgra now has turned its eyes toward Campbell in another category, testing a line of canned and plastic-tub soups in four markets.

Campbell changed the name of its Special Request low-salt soups, introduced in 1987, to Healthy Request in September. But ConAgra wrote Campbell asking it to "cease and desist" from using the Healthy Request name.

Campbell filed for declaratory judgment in U.S. District Court in Camden, N.J., on Dec. 7, and the case is still pending. □

Patriotism

German marques.

"We've seen nothing yet" in terms of a backlash against Japanese products, said Scott Gilbert, exec VP-management director of Team One, El Segundo, Calif., which handles Toyota Motor Sales USA's Lexus account. "But we're sensitive to the possibility."

In Germany, Mercedes-Benz and BMW officials are engaged in an intense lobbying effort to have political leaders disavow recent anti-American demonstrations, reported Automotive News.

Officials of the German companies acknowledged their North American marketing units have expressed concern about the potential for backlash from U.S. customers.

According to Integrated Automotive Resources, the number of consumers who said they would consider only a Japanese-built vehicle declined from 4.3% last July, just before Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, to 2.4% in late January. Consumers who would consider only a European make declined from 2% to 1.1%.

During the same period, the number who would consider only U.S.-built vehicles rose from 50.4% to 52.9%.

"These aren't huge differences, but there's obviously been some effect," some Thomas O'Grady, president of the consultancy. Mr. O'Grady said the successful use of U.S. technology in the early days of the war may have generated increased pride and confidence in American products overall.

BBDO's random survey asked consumers between Jan. 10 and 12 whether they had a preference for American branded products in a number of categories such as automobiles, wine, clothing, video equipment, TV sets and stereo equipment, said Thomas Neman, senior VP-director of planning and research at the agency's Southfield, Mich., office.

"The American psyche as a whole tends to overreact toward any problem, whether it's AIDS, the weather, the drought or the Gulf crisis."

"Buy American" sentiment was up across all those categories, he said. In the case of automobiles, 77% expressed a preference for U.S. brands, up from 62% the last time the survey was taken in 1989.

"There has been a growing trend toward pride in American values and pride in American-made products," Mr. Neman said. "And seven out of 10 consumers say that's a trend that will grow more in 1991."

Mr. Neman said it's important that U.S. manufacturers not appear to be opportunistic.

"We have to understand where the consumer's head is at and support him in his position," he said.

Any flag-waving ad campaign would be seen as "patronizing and pandering," said William Ludwig, exec VP-creative director on General Motors Corp.'s Chevrolet account at Lintas:Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich.

"The marketers who will do well will be those who align themselves with the broad mainstream of contemporary America," Mr. Ludwig said.

The current surge of American patriotism could be short-lived, he said, but the war could still turn out to be a watershed, causing many people to "reassess how they view the world and themselves."

Current consumer sentiments will change dramatically when the war ends, said John Rettie, editorial director at consultancy J.D. Power & Associates.

"The American psyche as a whole tends to overreact toward any problem, whether it's AIDS, the weather, the drought or the Gulf crisis," Mr. Rettie said. "Individuals forget very quickly. If somebody wants to buy a Mercedes-Benz, they're not going to change their mind because of the war." □ strategy to creative, media planning and a compensation package.

Messner Vetere "came up with a clever performance-based compensation package that made them our partner," Mr. Austin said. "If we do well, they will do well."

While not divulging details, Mr. Austin said the compensation is tied to Volvo performance measurements such as unit sales and market share. The plan provides a floor of compensation with incentives.

The Swedish carmaker is the No. 1 European importer of luxury autos, in units, in the U.S. Last year, Volvo had U.S. sales of 89,894, down 12.4% from 1989. The company had a 1% share of the new-car market both years.

Mr. Austin said Volvo officials probably "used a longer yardstick" to measure Messner Vetere because of outside speculation Mr. Schmetterer's ties to the company made the agency a prohibitive favorite.

Mr. Schmetterer agreed the mantle of favorite "was a tremendous extra burden." The agency conducted 21 research projects to get a feel for the marketplace.

"We had to work harder, we had further to go to prove to this company who at this very important juncture in their history is making a critical decision, to overcome negative press," he said.

Mr. Schmetterer acknowledged the agency had been pitching the Volvo account for five years, mainly by maintaining relationships with Volvo executives.

"If your relationships are good ones and productive ones, you stay in touch," he said. "Social relationships don't win accounts; business relationships do, ones where there's mutual respect."

Messner Vetere won MCI Communications Corp.'s $80 million account last September, and the Volvo win pushes billings to nearly $200 million. Since November, the agency has added about 20 staffers. □

Protests of CNN hit advertisers

Callers lash Arnett reports, but sponsors support network

An Ad Age roundup

Nabisco Brands and two other national advertisers last week said they had received a handful of angry calls and letters urging them to pull ads from the Cable News Network because of correspondent Peter Arnett's reports from Baghdad.

Sterling Motor Cars and KitchenAid, a division of Whirlpool Corp., also got complaints, but all three advertisers said they would maintain planned schedules on the all-news cable channel.

Despite the controversy surrounding Peter Arnett, ratings remain strong.

Mr. Arnett was the only correspondent reporting from Baghdad until last week, when an ABC correspondent joined him in the war-torn capital of Iraq. At press time, they remained there as reports surfaced that Iraq might be willing to withdraw from Kuwait.

Some of the calls and letters expressed concern that Mr. Arnett was serving as a mouthpiece for Iraqi propaganda. Among other things, Mr. Arnett has conducted a controversial face-to-face interview with Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

Some of CNN's advertisers have relayed expressions of concern from the public, acknowledged Joe Uva, head of sales at the network.

"We have had advertisers contact us about phone calls and letters they have received," Mr. Uva said. "But they basically want to make us aware of what some members of the public have expressed. Advertisers realize that the ratings are holding and what the public's overall response has been. The public is the ultimate decider. From our ratings track, it is clear the public still wants CNN to report."

CNN's average 24-hour Nielsen rating within the cable network's universe for the week of Feb. 6 through Feb. 12 was 2.7, reaching 1.5 million households. Last year during the same time period, the average 24-hour rating was 0.7, reaching 380,000 households.

"Advertisers who have asked to re-express [move to another time] their ads are doing so because of war coverage in general and that has been the case since day one," Mr. Uva said. "To my knowledge, we have not had to deal with situations where Mr. Arnett's reporting has caused us to reapportion ads."

Nabisco received a handful of letters and "a few calls" from consumers asking the company not to support CNN because of Mr. Arnett's reporting, said a spokesman for the advertiser.

He said the letters were "thoughtful and intelligent" arguments and weren't the sort of form letters traditionally sent by organized boycott groups.

State AGs attack downsized brands

By Judann Dagnoli

New York Attorney General Robert Abrams last week proposed state legislation that would require package goods companies to label downsized product changes with the words "reduced," "decreased" or "less" for at least six months.

The New York action could be a bellwether for similar moves from other state attorneys general offices, including Texas, California and Iowa. And that could create chaos for national marketers of package goods.

Texas Assistant Attorney General Stephen Gardner said his office "has opened an investigation" into downsizing, the practice of reducing package weight without decreasing package size or price.

California Assistant Attorney General Herschel Elkins said his office "is monitoring" events and sharing information with the New York attorney general.

The Iowa attorney general's office is also said to be preparing an investigation, but a spokesman said only that the office is "concerned" about downsizing.

The Grocery Manufacturers of America, a trade group whose members produce 85% of all package foods sold in the U.S., said it's steeling itself for further state investigations.

"We would not be at all surprised to see similar moves from other states," said Jeff Nedelman, the GMA's VP-communications.

While downsizing exists, it's a non-issue, Mr. Nedelman said, since marketers have been above-

J&J sets nighttime Tylenol

By Patricia Winters

Johnson & Johnson is aiming to wake up the sleep aids market with new Tylenol P.M.

J&J's McNeil Consumer Products Co., which will start shipping the product to retailers in April, will support the introduction with a multimillion-dollar TV campaign, retail sources say.

A McNeil spokesman confirmed the launch but said Tylenol P.M. would get a "phased-in national introduction." He wouldn't give details.

Tylenol P.M. will contain "a gentle ingredient to help you sleep."

Tylenol P.M. will go up against a growing Excedrin P.M. from Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. The new entry will contain Tylenol's main ingredient, acetaminophen, plus "a gentle ingredient to help you sleep," trade literature says.

Excedrin P.M. is also acetaminophen-based.

This is McNeil's latest effort to extend the popular brand name into new categories, and comes at a time when Tylenol pain reliever is facing ever-increasing competition from products containing ibuprofen, such as American Home Products Corp.'s Advil.

Just last fall, McNeil expanded Tylenol's presence in the cough-cold market with a variety of new

Bankruptcy blues

Agencies cope as marketers head for court

An Advertising Age roundup

When Carter Hawley Hale Stores filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization last week, it left a total of $8 million in unpaid bills at the Los Angeles Times and WPP Group's Cole & Weber.

By late in the week, however, interim financing came through and the media again were accepting ads as the West Coast department store chain began hyping Presidents' Day sales as if nothing had happened.

"It's business as usual," said Scott Marshall, president of Cole & Weber, a Seattle shop socked with $3.5 million in debts for broadcast media it placed for the retailer's northern California Emporium and Weinstocks divisions.

As more major advertisers sort out their financial dealings in bankruptcy court, ad agencies and the media are learning to accept such actions as a cost of doing business.

Della Femina, McNamee, New York, last month saw two clients —G. Heileman Brewing Co. and Pan Am Corp.—plunge into Chapter 11. Chairman Jerry Della Femina said Pan Am was "very current" when it filed, while Heileman owed the agency $563,754.

Mr. Della Femina said Heileman "was not a bad hit."

"I'm sure we'll get it back," he said. "You're talking about a client that spends $20 million to $30 million" annually.

Mr. Della Femina said the agency has grown accustomed to working with clients in Chapter 11.

"We're comfortable, otherwise we wouldn't be working with them," he said.

At Cole & Weber, with $95 million in billings and estimated gross revenues of $14 million, Carter Hawley's unpaid bills appear more burdensome. But Mr. Marshall insisted his agency can absorb the situation with no cutbacks.

"They've been a very good client for us," he said. "We're not terribly distressed."

An executive with close ties to Cole & Weber said the agency can weather the storm—assuming the client eventually repays most of its debt.

"In the end, they'll get paid," he said, though "they'll probably get the nasty letter from Martin Sorrell," chief executive of WPP.

WPP, facing it's own debt problems, has leaned on its agencies to avoid accounts where they risk not getting paid.

New York-based J. Walter Thompson Co., another WPP unit, twice recently has steered clear of accounts where it had financial concerns, though it has been hit in other bankruptcies.

Last year, JWT refused to accept the Continental Airlines account; by year's end, Continental was making its second appearance in bankruptcy court.

"The reality of doing business is that you have clients in various stages of success."

Late last year, JWT also let go of the $60 million media buying account of troubled Bally's Health & Tennis Corp.

Wells, Rich, Greene, which won the Continental business, is said to be owed between $6 million and $7 million by the airline.

Lintas:Ceco Communications, Warren, Mich., was owed $1.34 million when Continental filed for Chapter 11. But the agency continues to handle the direct marketing assignment.

Eugene Beard, chief financial officer at Interpublic Group of Cos., which owns Lintas:Ceco, said the agency expects to get repaid.

"I think we were very cautious in the way we handled" the account, he said. "Could we have handled it better? I don't know, it happened very suddenly."

Lintas:New York has written off the $2 million Eastern Airlines owed it when that airline filed for bankruptcy protection in 1989, Mr. Beard said, stressing that's a small amount of money for a company the size of Interpublic.

As for the media, Times Mirror Co.'s Los Angeles Times needs Carter Hawley as much as the department store needs the newspaper.

Carter Hawley's The Broadway-Southern California is both the region's biggest department store chain and, a Times Mirror spokeswoman said, "one of our biggest advertisers."

The Broadway spends nearly

CNN Int'l, MCI ink deal

NEW YORK—CNN International, Turner Broadcasting System's special 24-hour international news network, signed MCI as its first global advertiser. The communications company bought time on the "International Business Report," said Kay Delaney, senior VP, Turner International advertising sales. MCI's two-year deal is worth $8 million, Turner sources said.

Admen fight AIDS

NEW YORK—Twenty top-level creative directors are joining together to use ads to fight the spread of AIDS. The group's working title is Ads Against AIDS. Members include Philip Dusenberry, ceo of BBDO Worldwide's office here; Helayne Spivak, exec VP-executive creative director, Young & Rubicam; and Sean Fitzpatrick, vice chairman, McCann-Erickson Worldwide.

Sony sets review

PARK RIDGE, N.J.—Sony Corp. of America is reviewing agencies for its $15 million to $20 million account as part of efforts to expand its U.S. consumer electronics presence. Apparently out is Burkhardt & Christy, New York, which had handled magnetic products. Reportedly in the review are current agencies Geer, DuBois; Mingo Group; and Slater Hanft Martin, all New York, and non-Sony shops Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, and Della Femina, McNamee, New York.

Carl's Jr. seeks new shop

Scali sees four options

NEW YORK—Scali, McCabe, Sloves Chairman-CEO Marvin Sloves last week denied either Chiat/Day/Mojo or Lowe Group was in discussions to buy Scali from WPP Group. Mr. Sloves acknowledged longtime talks with Eurocom and said the French agency is one of four options "to get us out from WPP, which is my single-minded goal." The others are U.S.-based agencies and private investors, he said, declining to elaborate. He said no formal offers have been made.

Louis-Dreyfus pays

LONDON—Saatchi & Saatchi Co. Chief Executive Robert Louis-Dreyfus agreed to pay the U.S. Treasury $213,750 after being accused of insider trading, but admitted no wrongdoing. He allegedly told a friend, Adina Cohen, in 1988 about the impending acquisition of IMS International, a market research company. As president, Mr. Louis-Dreyfus arranged to sell IMS to Dun & Bradstreet for $1.7 billion in 1988. His credibility wasn't seen as being seriously tainted, since he wasn't accused of profiting from insider trading.

Vick joins Levine

NEW YORK—Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver named Edward Vick, 46, ceo-president, succeeding Robert Schmidt, who joined client Dreyfus Corp. last month. The agency was renamed Levine, Huntley, Vick & Beaver. Vice Chairman-Chief Creative Officer Allen Beaver, who had planned to leave, said he will stay indefinitely.

Bag those gas masks

Israelis have solved the Persian Gulf War's fashion crisis—how to carry your gas mask in style.

"People got tired of having to openly carry around these death toys," said Martha Meisel, a consumer affairs columnist for the Jerusalem Post, an English-language daily. "All the department stores and office supply stores are doing a mad business in the bags. . . . Many people are grabbing them up just as collector items."

Modan has produced more than 100,000 waterproof nylon bags and is running "three factory shifts to keep up with the craze," said Oded Shapira, Modan's deputy managing director. The bags, priced at $4 each, are available in 16 colors.

A $2 white plastic carton is being sold by Pol Sakit through the Co-op department store chain.

"We have gone one step better by adding graphics to our boxes with the slogan [in Hebrew] 'Patriot—that's me,' " referring to the Patriot missiles helping protect Israel from Scud missile attacks, said Aaron Grossbard, Pol Sakit managing director.

While neither Modan nor Pol Sakit has advertised its bags, the Post earlier this month started advertising a heavy canvas bag sold for $9 through its mail order department. The campaign is created in-house.

"We are not in it for the profit, and all revenue after costs is going to new Russian and Ethiopian immigrants through our 'Welcome Home' [immigrant assistance fund]. We even gave a free one to Mayor Dinkins of New York when he visited for a day," a spokesman for the newspaper's mail order department said.

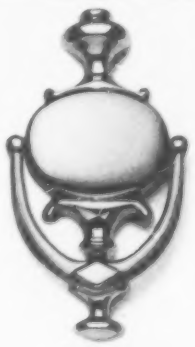
The old office



The Home Office

Today there's a new way of doing business. You're just as likely to find an executive working in a suburban colonial as in an urban skyscraper. And these home workers are just as likely to be purchasing office equipment and services as their corporate counterparts. Because technology is the key to their success.

With growth exceeding 15% annually, these 34.8 million home office buyers are changing the face of business by spending an estimated $35 billion on office products.

$50 million annually in newspapers, with the Times the primary beneficiary. The paper, which wouldn't discuss the situation, has little choice other than waiting for the court to rule on repayment of the $4.5 million in outstanding debt.

"The reality of doing business is that you have clients in various stages of success," said Dan Fabian, VP-general manager of the Tribune Co.'s WGN-AM, which is owed $173,521 by Heileman.

He said that debt is a small portion of what the brewer spends on WGN.

Agencies are bound to be drawn into bankruptcy court as creditors, particularly when times get tough for clients, said Robert A. Goodman, president of Robert A. Goodman Associates, a New York accounting firm that handles dozens of ad agencies.

"You can't very well go to every client and say, 'I want you to pay for your own media,' so in bad times, everyone gets stung," Mr. Goodman said.

There are ways to avoid getting stuck with the bill, however, some executives say.

"The question of making sure [agencies] have the client's money first has always been an uppermost thought in our minds," Mr. Goodman said. "Sometimes [agencies] are stupid about it and allow their clients to use the agency's money, which is ridiculous."

The normal relationship between agencies, clients and media is fraught with problems in the case of bankruptcy, said Howard Seife, a lawyer who heads the bankruptcy division of Winston & Strawn's New York office, which represents Della Femina.

"In dealing with the media, the question is, is the agency liable or the principal?" Mr. Seife said. "The relationship is generally unclear."

A former financial executive at a major New York agency said his shop always checked the credit of potential clients before pitching the business.

"We would . . . ask ourselves, 'Would I lend them money?' If we couldn't get [that information because it was] a private company, we wouldn't take the account," the executive said.

On a questionable client, the agency would set a maximum amount of credit and not exceed it. Or it would ask for a letter of credit that could be redeemed from banks when money was owed. Another option was to ask the client to place money in an escrow account to cover media bills.

Asked whether those demands upset potential clients, the executive said: "It indicated an element of financial acumen. I think they respect you." □

Newsstand sales ebb for top titles

By Ira Teinowitz

The Audit Bureau of Circulations' yearend magazine circulation report provides the clearest sign yet that the economy may be affecting newsstand sales.

Of the nation's top 20 magazines, only two—National Geographic and Newsweek—reported increases in single-copy sales (up 1% and 5%, respectively) with a third—Prevention—reporting no change. The Audit Bureau FAS-FAX report, released last week, compares circulation of the last half of 1990 with the last half of 1989.

The remaining 15 that sell single copies all reported decreases, some large though in some cases balanced by increased subscriptions.

McCall's reported its single-copy sales fell 27.9% to 433,114, though overall circulation fell only 1.4% to 5,020,127. Family Circle's single-copy sales fell 20.4% to 3,056,692, but overall circulation was down 0.6% to 5,431,779 because of a 46.3% boost in subscriptions. Woman's Day, which offered a 79¢ issue and poly-bagged two issues together one month, saw single-copy sales drop 18.2% to 3,763,247, though overall circulation rose 2.1% to 4,802,842 as the magazine boosted its previously negligible subscription base by nearly 1 million.

"The single-copy marketplace is a disaster. There are twice as many books at checkout, and slotting allowances [offered retailers] are diluting everybody's sale."

Better Homes & Gardens saw its single-copy sales drop 10.4% to 515,833, though the magazine's overall circulation of 8,007,222 was unchanged.

While the decline in single-copy sales appeared a clear trend, overall circulation results varied, according to the report.

In the top 100 publications, the largest circulation decline was reported by First for Women (all newsstand sales), down 24.5% to 2,649,810. Penthouse reported its circulation fell 14.4% to 1,612,574, well below its 2 million rate base. The publication is cutting its rate base to 1.5 million in July.

The largest increase was posted by Cooking Light, up 34.1% to 924,499.

Magazine executives cautioned that the economy may not be completely to blame for newsstand sales declines.

"The single-copy marketplace is a disaster," said Wm Stevens, publisher of Family Circle. "There are twice as many books at checkout, and slotting allowances [offered retailers] are diluting everybody's sale. There are also changing shopping patterns, with moms shopping less and teens doing the shopping. But there also are more books and less dollars, and if the choice is between buying a loaf of bread or a magazine. . . ."

Publishers have been switching to subscription sales, said Don Kummerfeld, president of the Magazine Publishers of America.

"One obvious reason is that publishers are pushing subscriptions so well that people who are buying the magazines buy them through subscriptions," he said.

He also suggested people are buying the same number of magazines, but special-interest quarterlies and annuals are giving more competition to traditional magazines.

"The competition for shelf space is becoming fierce," Mr. Kummerfeld said. "Total sales have not declined. This is only looking at ABC numbers. More and more of those titles on newsstands are not sold through subscription or audited."

Special-interest publications are taking a bite out of other magazines' newsstand sales, said Robert O'Donnell, senior VP-general manager of Playboy, which reported newsstand sales down 8.7% to 816,291 but overall circulation up 2% to 3,488,006.

"I don't think there is an enormous amount of evidence that it is due to the economy," he said. "These are not high-ticket items. I've been in the newsstand business going on 10 years, and it's been a problem for that long. It's the special-interest publications. They tend not to be ABC-audited, so nobody sees it."

Better Homes & Gardens Publisher Jerry Kaplan said he believes newsstand sales aren't suffering as a whole, but individual magazines are getting hurt.

"My feeling is that it is a zero-sum game," he said. "Consumers will spend X amount of money at the newsstand, and if one magazine is up, another is down."

Other top 20 magazines reporting slipping single-copy sales included Reader's Digest, down 3.3% to 893,500; TV Guide, off 4.8% to 6,878,716; Good Housekeeping, down 6.1% to 1,419,690; Ladies' Home Journal, down 0.8% to 960,729; Time, down 5.9% to 205,504; Redbook, down 1.6% to 741,862; National Enquirer, down 6.7% to 3,418,536; Star, down 5.4% to 2,974,980; Sports Illustrated, down 14.5% to 104,119; and People, down 1% to 1,731,808. □

Reebok trouble for HHCC?

STOUGHTON, Mass.—Reebok International's relationship with Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos is showing signs of strain. Hill Holliday President Jack Connors last week denied rumors the agency will resign the account as of March 1, but said he's not overly optimistic about the account. "I'm not sure we feel we'll be with Reebok as long as we'll be with Infiniti or some other clients. It's a volatile piece of business," Mr. Connors said. He said Reebok hasn't indicated it plans a review for the main assignment or to fire the agency. Reebok executives were traveling and couldn't be reached for comment at press time. Separately, Reebok France, Paris, last week named HDM France to succeed Ecom on its $11 million French account.

Pepsi gets flavorful

SOMERS, N.Y.—Pepsi-Cola Co. last week began a test in Tulsa, Okla., of flagship Pepsi-Cola with natural fruit flavors: Raging Razzberry, Strawberry Burst and Tropical Chill. The test is a limited-edition promotion, said Gary Gerdemann, Pepsi public relations manager, and even if it's successful it won't necessarily become a permanent addition. Called "The Wild Bunch," the trio is sold in cans with special graphics reflecting flavor variations. TV spots break today. Print, outdoor and point-of-purchase support. BBDO Worldwide, New York, handles.

Zale taps 2 shops

IRVING, Texas—Zale Corp. consolidated its estimated $35 million account with Bozell here and the Richards Group, Dallas. Bozell was named agency of record for business including the Bailey Banks & Biddle group, Gordon's Jewelers and a variety of shops operating under other names including Linz. Richards picked up the Zales Jewelers account. Zale wouldn't discuss previous agency relationships; however, most work was handled on a project basis by a variety of agencies, primarily Bozell and Saffer Advertising, Toronto. Estimates ranged from an even split to $26 million for Bozell and $9 million for Richards.

BK brakes the 'rules'

By Scott Hume

Burger King franchisees are finally having it their way.

The No. 2 burger chain in April will drop its 18-month-old ad theme, "Sometimes you've gotta break the rules," a positioning statement the chain admits confused customers and angered franchisees.

In its place, Burger King Corp. will likely adopt the theme, "Your way. Right away," a variation on the "Have it your way" theme used during the 1970s.

The new theme is now being presented to franchisees in a series of regional meetings that Burger King marketing executives are holding with operators across the country.

An updated version of the "Have it your way" jingle, originally developed by BBDO Worldwide, New York, was played for franchisees, but no commitment was made to using the tune with the new campaign, expected to start April 15.

"There was cheering when they said 'Break the rules' was dead," one franchisee said. "They admitted it was never clearly defined for consumers and was divisive in the system. But that's been true for a long time."

G. Langstaff

Exec VP-Marketing Gary Langstaff, who's defended the "Break the rules" theme despite franchisee protest since it began in October 1989, was absent from the regional marketing meetings.

Mr. Langstaff is "in the Far East on Burger King business," said Cori Zywotow, the chain's director of media relations, who said she wouldn't comment on some franchisee speculation about his absence.

Also, Ms. Zywotow said, "There has been no sign-off on a new theme. There's nothing set in concrete yet; it's all still being worked on."

In a move analysts say is symptomatic of a trend gripping the fast-food industry, Burger King's 1991 marketing strategy will concentrate more on price and value, rather than premium tie-ins with licensed properties. Tie-ins with "Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles," "Beetlejuice" and "The Simpsons" were the foundation of its 1990 marketing plan.

Along with the new theme, the new strategy will return the emphasis to elements Burger King used to define itself during the '60s and '70s: flame-broil cooking of its

Diamandis makes his bid

Investors want Donnelley

By Scott Donaton and Alison Fahey

Magazine mogul Peter Diamandis is part of a small investor group that's close to buying Donnelley Marketing from Dun & Bradstreet Corp. for an estimated $225 million.

Donnelley, on the block since last May, is the nation's largest distributor of cents-off coupons through its profitable Carol Wright division and a major provider of mailing lists through its Donnelley Direct unit. Carol Wright Sales, which markets merchandise through direct mail, is also included in the sale, say sources familiar with the deal.

Mr. Diamandis' interest might lie in Donnelley's crown jewel, a data base of some 85 million U.S. households considered to be the most sophisticated of its kind.

Mr. Diamandis last week acknowledged he's part of a group negotiating to acquire a direct marketing company he declined to identify. A deal could be finalized as early as today, he said.

Dun & Bradstreet declined comment.

"The reason we're interested is it's a data base-oriented company that has all the ability to target market, which is the buzzword today," Mr. Diamandis said.

TV networks pump up Olympics

By Wayne Walley

NEW YORK—CBS and NBC are planning Olympic-size advertising and promotional campaigns to turn the 1992 Games into the most heavily promoted network events in history.

Both networks will offer advertisers a wide array of Olympics marketing opportunities, including sweepstakes promotions, direct marketing campaigns, mall tours and cross-media ad packages.

Network executives say they're negotiating with Olympics sponsors to create giant retail-driven co-promotions similar to last fall's "Get Ready Giveaway" sweepstakes between CBS and Kmart Corp. and "McMillions on NBC" between that network and McDonald's Corp.

The deals will eclipse those premiere week extravaganzas in scope, sources say.

CBS will telecast the '92 Winter Olympics in Albertville, France, while NBC will carry the Summer Games in Barcelona.

"Almost all Olympics buys are tied to marketing programs or cross-promotions for 1992."

"In 1988, we assumed the Olympics sold themselves—and they do to some degree," said John Miller, NBC's exec VP-marketing. "But you have to help it along, and what will fuel it is major tie-ins with several advertisers. Before, Olympics advertisers got pins, trips and spots in the telecast; now almost all Olympics buys are tied to marketing programs or cross-promotions for 1992."

A "giant retail-driven promotion" for the Winter Olympics is "just a matter of conversations," said George Schweitzer, senior VP-communications, CBS/Broadcast Group.

He declined to identify target advertisers, though Kmart would be the prime candidate, considering the relationship between the retailer and the network. The "Get Ready Giveaway" also ran in 1989.

Kmart is talking with CBS about an ex-

MCI spots tease new discount plan

By Kate Fitzgerald

MCI Communications Corp. next month is expected to unveil a new discount plan on long-distance service.

The telecommunications company is airing TV spots promising something new is coming March 18, and industry sources say it's likely to be a discount on frequently called numbers, the first time such a service has been offered to consumers.

Two 30-second teaser spots broke Feb. 17 on network TV. Among the celebrities featured are model Elle MacPherson and TV personalities Regis Philbin and Kathie Lee Gifford.

Two more :30s featuring Zsa Zsa Gabor and New York Giants coach Bill Parcells are being cycled in the pool of teaser spots before a general campaign for the discount starts next month, sources say.

Messner Vetere Berger Carey Schmetterer, New York, handles MCI's $51 million account.

MCI, the No. 2 long-distance telephone marketer, refused to detail the upcoming offer, but competitors in the $55 billion industry are wary of MCI's latest maneuver and say they may retaliate.

"It had better be good to justify all the drum rolls," Burke Stinson, spokesman for long-distance leader AT&T Co., said in reference to the teaser campaign.

Elle MacPherson is one of the celebrities teasing for MCI's still-secret long-distance discount plan.

Mr. Stinson also said AT&T is watching MCI's promotion and plans to counter it if it turns out to be "significant." N W Ayer, Young & Rubic[illegible] and Ogilvy & Mather handle [illegible]T's $200 million-plus account.

No. 3 US Sprint doesn't plan to react to MCI's new campaign but "very possibly" may roll out a new product or service in the near future, said Steve Dykes, public relations spokesman. J. Walter Thompson, San Francisco, handles Sprint's $40 million campaign.

Industry sources say MCI is using the tease tactic to maximize the value of a discount in an era when price is less important in long-distance phone marketing.

"In general, prices on long-distance telephone calls have stabilized, but there will continue to be pockets of discounts out there," Mr. Stinson said. Whether it's detergent or long-distance calling, discounts will still be used to woo new customers over." □

Benetton condom kindness

Giveaways planned for stores in Europe, U.S.

By Michelle McCarter

ROME—Benetton, reinforcing its controversial reputation gained from provocative ads, plans to distribute free condoms in key stores in Europe and the U.S.

In addition, the Treviso, Italy-based clothing marketer is developing a magazine, possibly to be called The United People of Benetton.

The company hasn't decided whether the monthly —focusing on the company, its collection and different cultures—will be sold on newsstands or in its stores, or if it will accept outside advertising, said Alessio Fornavetti, ad director.

For the condom program, Benetton is currently choosing key shops to give away free colored condoms. The program will start soon in Europe and [illegible]l eventually reach the U.S., Mr. Fornavetti said.

The condom giveaway will be supported by the new Benetton ad showing different colored condoms. That ad was rejected by weekly Italian magazine Amica, published by Rizzoli-Corrierre della Sera, one of Italy's largest publishing groups, but is running in many other international markets.

Benetton said the ad is in line with the company's philosophy not to push a product but to attract attention to its name by addressing social issues.

Benetton's philosophy is not to push a product but to attract attention to its name by addressing social issues.

Another ad in Benetton's $30 million worldwide campaign also has caused a stir.

A Benetton print ad showing a cemetery with tombstones representing various religions is breaking this week in France, Norway, Switzerland and Portugal. It will run in the U.S. this spring. The Italian Advertising Council rejected the ad, which ran in two Italian dailies just before the Persian Gulf War started. The ad appeared to protest the war, the council said.

The council "did not understand that the message was a hymn to peace," said Oliviero Toscani, who creates Benetton's ads. □

Japanese VCRs cut out ads

By David Kilburn

TOKYO—Mitsubishi Electric Corp. has developed a VCR device that can edit out almost all commercials, and the Japanese ad community isn't pleased.

All but the marketer's cheapest VCRs will have the ability to skip spots when TV programs are recorded. Because most commercials in Japan use stereo sound and most TV programs use monaural, a semiconductor device in the VCR can distinguish between the two signals, enabling the spots to be cut.

The device expands the capabilities of the company's Auto Cut VCR, which edits commercials during bilingual programming, to nearly all programming.

The Auto Cut VCR was introduced last April and sells for $575 to $1,000; pricing for the new models isn't available. It's also not known if Mitsubishi will bring the new product to the U.S.

"Frankly, we don't like [the Mitsubishi VCR]," said Taki Okamoto, director of marketing services at Leo Burnett-Kyodo. "If this catches on, it can affect us negatively because it makes the advertising marketplace less efficient."

TV executives also aren't pleased.

"As a privately managed TV station that relies on its financial resources from commercial broadcasts, we feel it is neither ethical nor desirable to broadcast material that promotes a system . . . that undermines the financial base of our operations and threatens the business of our sponsors," said Eiji Tamaki, spokesman for the sales department of Fuji Television, the top-[illegible]ted Japanese network.

He added, however, that Fuji Television didn't "expect significant commercial ramifications." □

AMAZING FEET

Accepting the risk as part of the excitement, Centel staffers spiritedly take to wilderness

By Barbara Hetzer

The office troops need a boost. Too much stress and hard work, perhaps. Or, simply, too many hours spent sitting in a stuffy office building.

In recent years, executives have broken those mind-numbing, 9-to-5 routines by spending time with employees, or clients, in the great outdoors.

But some corporations may reconsider such outings since a U.S. District Court jury in November ordered DDB Needham Worldwide to pay $1.1 million to the family of drowning victim James Fasules. He and four others drowned in 1987 while on an agency-sponsored rafting trip on the Chilko River.

"I haven't heard any change of plans yet," says Felix Kent, an attorney with Hall, Dickler, Lawler, Kent & Friedman, which counts several advertising agencies as clients. "But companies . . . had better carefully select the supervisors of such projects. Otherwise, they could be subsequently accused of negligence."

Centel CEO Jack Frazee hasn't let such worries stop him.

In 1988, he, along, with eight of his top management staff, first experienced Outward Bound, a wilderness adventure that he believes sharpens problem-solving, teamwork and leadership skills.

"I had never done it before," says the 46-year-old head of the telecommunications giant, "but the idea intrigued me."

At the time, Mr. Frazee was familiar with the Chilko case.

"I asked how safe the program was," he says, "and the folks at Outward Bound used that case as an example of things that could happen."

Mr. Frazee was not deterred.

"We assume a business risk every day," he says. "Besides, the risk involved is one of the trip's exciting elements."

Centel participants spend four rigorous days trekking through a desert, hiking up a mountain or navigating a river.

Their philosophy: A few days spent in an unfamiliar environment binds colleagues together and forces them to re-evaluate the way they accomplish assignments.

Although Mr. Frazee, a college all-around athlete, regularly rides horses and plays golf, he found the experience taxing.

"I spent the first several hours walking around with a 75-pound knapsack on my back, trying to figure out how I could get out of it," he says. "And I suspect I wasn't the only one feeling that way."

But Mr. Frazee thrived on the adventure after he learned a valuable lesson.

"Executives are very good at planning and organizing others, but we don't listen very well," he confesses. "The guides told us how to hike and carry our packs, which essentially made the whole thing very easy. But initially I didn't listen, because I thought I knew everything."

Since that first outing, Mr. Frazee has held a series of drawings whereby Centel employees win an Outward Bound trip. The response has been overwhelming: 75% of the company's employees have entered the contests.

One employee, Dianne Ursick, general regulator and planning manager for one of Centel's telephone companies, was in the midst of a divorce when she went on an Outward Bound rafting trip in 1989.

"As I learned to work through my fears and reach each new goal, that trip really helped me regain my self-confidence."

Raised on an Iowa farm, Ms. Ursick is at home in the great outdoors. Not so with every Outward Bounder.

"I had never previously camped out or done anything like that. Never even slept in a tent in the backyard overnight," says Kevin Gallagher, VP-legal, Centel Cellular Co. "With that kind of lack of experience, to go out and spend the night sleeping on the ground alone in a place called Rattlesnake Canyon is really sort of remarkable. Sometimes I can't believe I did it."

This year, Mr. Frazee expects more of Centel's individual business units to schedule Outward Bound trips.

So far, nothing has occurred to change Mr. Frazee's mind about the value of the trips.

"Just some scraped knees and skinned hands," he explains. □

WORKING MOMS, HARD CHOICES

Working moms have it harder; how the first of three balances motherhood while climbing the career ladder

By Barbara Hetzer

If today's working woman wants to have a baby, she still faces harsh choices: Either drop out, slow down or do it all.

For many women—especially those just breaking into middle- or upper-management posts—the stakes are high, the fears great.

Some women say their maternity gives male counterparts the "edge." Men can still work around the clock if needed.

Others say motherhood is the surest way to derail a fast-track career: Pregnancy is often read as a lack of commitment.

And still others dread the balancing act of nurturing the baby one minute and supervising a staff of 15 the next, fearing they'll do neither very well.

Many employers are responding—albeit slowly—with innovations, such as part-time tracks, job sharing and daycare centers meant to ease the burden, but most women must still devise their own strategy.

In this, the first in a series of three articles, Advertising Age examines the options today's working mothers face.

* * * *

"It's impossible to totally balance the two," says Shelley Diamond, a 37-year-old senior VP-management supervisor at Young & Rubicam, New York.

"Juggling kids and a career is like putting out fires. You focus on what demands your attention at any particular moment."

That's tough talk. But Ms. Diamond, a mother of three kids under age 6, still wants it all—no matter what the price.

"My mother was a housewife and hated it," she explains, "so she instilled in me this incredible sense of independence and ambition."

Like her mother, Ms. Diamond believes she wouldn't be satisfied as a stay-at-home mom. "I'd be terrible. I'd be so impatient with my children," she says. "I'd put them to bed at 6 o'clock every night just to get some peace."

Instead, Ms. Diamond works full time supervising the corporate and international portions of the Xerox Corp. account at Y&R; the workday parenting is left to a babysitter.

"Do I feel guilty? Of course," she says. "Especially when something goes wrong. Then I immediately blame my job."

Case in point: Last December, when Ms. Diamond was away on business, her 5-year-old daughter, Brooke, had a terrible time at kindergarten. The child's teacher reprimanded Ms. Diamond at the next open school day.

"She said, 'The problem is that Brooke misses her mommy. You need to spend a little more time with her,' " recalls Ms. Diamond.

"And I thought, 'Why don't you just stab me in the heart?' "

For the next several days, Ms. Diamond made every effort to spend more time with her daughter. One afternoon, she even took Brooke to work with her.

"We went down to the art director's office and got a big pad and a huge box of markers," she says. "Brooke absolutely loved it because she saw where mommy works and felt a little bit more involved in my life."

But such special attention is sporadic. Ms. Diamond, who moved to Y&R earlier this month after a brief stint at Kobs & Draft, just doesn't have the time for it. Before her move, she would arrive at her Manhattan apartment most evenings by 6 p.m. and spend about three hours each night trying to juggle three kids and their different interests.

Brooke wanted to play Nintendo; 2½-year-old Samantha wanted to color; and 10-month-old Lukas just wanted to be held. After they were in bed, Ms. Diamond often did an hour or two of take-home work.

After Lukas was born in April, she returned to work full time last September after a five-month maternity leave.

Unfortunately, her job no longer existed. During her absence, Xerox—her account at Backer Spielvogel Bates—switched to Y&R.

"I told [Backer] I was coming back," she says, "so when we lost Xerox, the agency president called and said, 'Don't worry.' " She didn't.

A few weeks later she accepted the job at Kobs & Draft, a post that took her out of traditional advertising. Ms. Diamond was there a mere four months when Y&R came calling, at the behest of her former client, Xerox.

Ms. Diamond had tried to convince herself moving into direct marketing was a smart maneuver.

"I missed TV and radio and those spectacular print units," she says. So she snatched up Y&R's offer, even though it means longer hours, more frequent business trips and less time with the kids. "I just couldn't resist it," she says.

Doug Goodman

As career-driven as she appears, Ms. Diamond is not without her doubts. "Part-time work would be the answer to every working mother's prayers," she says, "but U.S. corporations are way behind the times in that regard."

At Backer, Ms. Diamond says it was known she would have preferred to work fewer days or at home some of the time, but she never pushed it.

"I can't imagine that it would ever have happened, especially in today's market," she says. "You know there are 10 people out there who will take your job if you can't handle it."

Ms. Diamond definitely doesn't want to sacrifice either her career satisfaction or her lifestyle.

"I like my job and the money that two salaries yield. You put so much into your career for so many years that it's hard to just slow down or drop out for a while when you have a child. You fear you'll never get back in," she says.

The choice to work wasn't always so clear-cut.

In 1985, after she returned from her first maternity leave to her job as VP-account supervisor at Ted Bates Advertising, Ms. Diamond didn't know what to do.

"Here was this tiny baby, the most miraculous thing that had ever happened, and I had to leave her every morning," she says. "At work, I just longed to be with her."

Over the next several weeks, Ms. Diamond says, "I simply got used to it." □

JANUARY AD RESULTS

No January thaw

Most magazines still frozen in ad page declines

By Scott Donaton

Magazine publishers started the new year with a whimper.

Ad pages continued their downward spiral in January, with titles tracked by Publishers Information Bureau carrying 9,541.3 ad pages, down 3% from January 1990.

The weak performance comes on the heels of a soft 1990, when magazine ad pages dropped 3.7%.

Automotive ad pages rose 1.6% to 1,327.5 in January. But cigarette/tobacco advertising continued to fall: The category totaled 307.6 ad pages for the month, down 24.4%.

Overall, ad pages for the top 10 categories were virtually flat, down 0.7% to 6,585.1.

The Time Warner weeklies, among the hardest hit by last year's downturn, bucked the trend last month. People carried 187.9 ad pages, up 34.2%; Time was up 3.9% with 165 pages; and Sports Illustrated saw pages rise 7.7% to 129.9.

Other weeklies didn't fare as well. TV Guide led all PIB-tracked magazines, but its ad pages were down 10.1% to 227.6. Business Week, 1990's ad page leader, carried 163.9 pages in January, an 8.4% decline. The Economist's ad pages fell 26% to 129.5, New York Magazine's 124.1 ad pages were down 16% and The New Yorker's 89.7 ad pages were off 34.5%.

Among newsweeklies, Newsweek carried 100.4 ad pages, down 6.8%, and U.S. News & World Report was down 3.7% with 83.2 pages.

Forbes led the top three business books with 223.5 ad pages, a 9.5% decline. Fortune's ad pages dipped a whopping 35% to 95.7 for the month.

Women's service magazines posted surprisingly disparate results for January. Ladies' Home Journal led the Seven Sisters with 96.3 ad pages, up 15.7%. Good Housekeeping showed a 24% gain with 94.2 pages. McCall's—overhauled last year—finished third for the month with 72.6 ad pages, up 29.8%.

Travel advertising—a mainstay of most upscale titles—was scaled back as war fears grew and the recession deepened.

For the other sisters, the picture was bleaker. Family Circle was down 5.4% with 58.5 ad pages. Woman's Day carried 57.4 pages, down 23.3%; industry observers say the magazine is still being punished for Hachette's failed attempt to sell it last year. Better Homes & Garden, with 56 ad pages, was off 13.3%. Redbook was nearly flat with 55.4 pages, a 0.6% decline.

Upscale monthlies, among the last to feel the effects of last year's downturn, were battered in January. Travel advertising—a mainstay of most upscale titles—was scaled back as war fears grew and the recession deepened.

Architectural Digest carried 82.5 ad pages, a 29.4% drop. Smithsonian was down 15.5% to 67.3 pages. Town & Country's 44.2 ad pages represented a 50.9% loss.

In the travel field, Travel & Leisure carried 67.1 ad pages, down 22.5%. Conde Nast Traveler was down 14.9% with 48.7 pages.

Playboy led the general-interest men's field in January with 74.7 ad pages, up 28.6%. Penthouse carried 71.8 pages, up 26.3%. GQ's pages dipped 9.1% to 61.8, and Esquire's pages fell 28.8% to 44.8.

The automotive field was one of the month's bright spots. Car & Driver carried 96.8 ad pages, a 2.4% decline. Road & Track's 85 ad pages were up 37.1%. Motor Trend saw ad pages rise 23.9% to 66.6. And Automobile's pages climbed 23.2% to 56.3.

Among the highlights for January were increases in scattered fields: Ski (138.7 ad pages, up 19%); Popular Photography (110.9 pages, up 10.3%); Skiing (102 pages, up 27.9%); Gourmet (87.5 pages, up 38%); Parents (77 pages, up 20.4%); Omni (55.8 pages, up 29.2%); The Atlantic (50.3 pages, up 20.6%); and Practical Homeowner (44.4 pages, up 48.8%). □

Editorial and business-side developments in print media.

A magazine grows in Moscow. The first issue of Novii Fermer, a Russian-language agricultural magazine, rolled off the presses in the Soviet Union this month, five months after the death of Rodale Press Chairman Robert Rodale, who championed the project. The every-other-monthly is a joint venture between Emmaus, Pa.-based Rodale and Vneshtorgizdat, the publishing arm of the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Trade. Mr. Rodale was killed last September in a car crash in the Soviet Union while completing arrangements for the magazine's launch. Novii Fermer's initial circulation is 50,000. Publisher is Rodale VP Chuck McCullagh. Rodale is also developing a Russian-language edition of Prevention.

The late Robert Rodale backed the effort.

Planting a 200-year-old seed. The Old Farmer's Almanac—traditionally relying on mail order advertisers—will use its 200th anniversary next year to pitch more national advertising. The annual book of weather forecasts, astronomy charts and recipes is North America's oldest continuously published periodical, says puolisher Yankee Publishing, Dublin, N.H. The Almanac is offering advertisers in its 1992 edition category exclusivity and inclusion in a "multimillion-dollar" marketing campaign. Color page rate is $88,500. General Mills' Total cereal has bought the book's back cover. Yankee will increase the Almanac's pressrun by 58% to 6.3 million from 4 million copies for the bicentennial edition, available in September.

Repotting an old bloom. Garden Design will be repositioned, redesigned and relaunched in March as an upscale exterior design magazine. The American Society of Landscape Architects sold the 9-year-old title last summer to Evergreen Publishing, Westport, Conn. The magazine had been undercapitalized and underpromoted, said Publisher Arthur Loomis. Frequency was increased to every-other-monthly from quarterly in January; the rate base will grow 117% to 65,000 from 30,000 with the March/April issue. Mr. Loomis said that issue will carry a record 54 ad pages, about half from marketers of upscale consumer products and services.

Mature media. More than 300 media outlets including national and regional magazines, newspapers, mailing lists, and radio and TV programs targeting consumers 50 and older are listed in "Senior Media Guide. 1991," published by CD Publications, 8204 Fenton St., Silver Spring, Md. 20910. □

New options and developments in alternative media.

Shop by numbers. Three Southern supermarket chains—Shop-Rite Supermarkets, Publix Supermarkets and Homeland—have agreed to feature Shoppers Calculator.

The solar-powered calculator is attached to a shopping cart handle, with space next to the calculator keypad for retailer and advertiser ads.

ADDvantage Media Group, Tulsa, Okla., markets Shoppers Calculator. Category-exclusive ad packages are based on a four-week cycle and are sold on a chain-by-chain basis or in select markets. Average costs per store per cycle range from $30 to $50, an estimated cost per thousand of 65¢ to 85¢. Participating advertisers include Bama Pies, Coca-Cola Co., Dr Pepper Co. and Pepsi-Cola Co.

Michael's playground. General Mills' Wheaties, CBS/Fox Video Sports and NBA Entertainment have been given the green light to produce "Michael Jordan's Playground," the first sports video to combine original footage with a story line and an exclusive sound track. The video is the sequel to Mr. Jordan's "Come Fly with Me." Wheaties will offer consumers a $2.50 rebate with proof-of-purchase; videos will carry coupons for the cereal. Commercials for Wheaties will appear at the start and end of the video. □

Excedrin pounds home message for its Aspirin Free medication

(Rating:★ ★ ½)

By Bob Garfield

Garfield

The new TV spot for Aspirin Free Excedrin sets you reeling in the first 6 sickening seconds, beginning with an oblique overhead shot of a young woman at her computer in the cluttered corner of her in-home office.

Next is a close-up of her leaning back, eyes closed, massaging her neck. She looks beat, and no wonder. The place is a wreck, there's an electrical storm going on and the amplified ambient sound is a rasp on raw nerves: thundering thunder, clicking keyboard, beeping computer and the particularly petulant thrumming of the printer.

The third shot takes the computer's onscreen spreadsheet figures and the lady's enervated reflection in and out of focus. Through the monitor glass darkly, as the phosphorous green figures fuzz out, we see her eyes close. Cut to a side view: She's bending forward, rubbing her face and sweeping back her hair.

This is not a happy lady, and I ain't feeling too good myself. If Ronald McDonald tries to make you hungry, this spot from DDB Needham Worldwide, New York, goes the clown one better. It makes you dizzy and cranky this instant.

Husband (at the doorway): "How's your headache?"

Wife (bemused): "I'm sorry. What'd you say?"

Husband: "I said, How's your headache?"

Wife (with some irritation): "How did you know I have a headache?"

Husband: "Maybe you should lie down."

Wife (more insistently): "How did you know I have a headache?!"

Husband (gently): "Honey, it shows."

Voice-over: "For a headache so bad it shows, take Aspirin Free Excedrin."

Wife: "Aspirin FREE Excedrin?"

Husband: "Aspirin free. It works."

Voice-over: "Aspirin-free relief, for a headache so bad it shows."

Wife (looking at her compact mirror, sighing and smiling with relief): "Ohhhhh. That's more like it."

I'll say. The spot is over, and these refugees from "thirtysomething" are out of our face. This jarringly genuine slice of yuppie life, this mundane moment of dramatic tension, this Michael-and-Hope-like glimpse at minor spousal confrontation is over. Much like viewing "thirtysomething," in fact, our morbid fascination with real-life demicrisis collides with our desire for escape from such quotidian stress—only in this case, the desire for escape wins.

Which, oddly enough, may be this commercial's strength. If its oppressive verisimilitude and crushing peevishness cause us in life's overwrought moments to think of Aspirin Free Excedrin, Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. is way ahead of the game. More's the pity.

Bully for evocative advertising, but in the end, this is just another disingenuous painkiller ad.

Historically, the relentless striving for differentiation among branded analgesics has produced some of marketing's darkest hours, and we have yet fully to see the light. The brazen invention of phony miracle ingredients and the malignantly deceptive mutation of language, yes, have largely vanished—only to be replaced by a maddening conspiracy of silence. Bufferin and Excedrin, Advil and Nuprin, Anacin and Arthritis Pain Formula—even the sainted Tylenol—all perpetuate consumer confusion by nondisclosure of their prosaic contents.

What promises to be a penetrating look at a penetrating headache for Aspirin Free Excedrin ultimately is just another painkiller commercial.

"Strong medicine for pain" and similar copy may be true, but it purposely obscures the central fact: these expensive brands are aspirin, acetaminophen or ibuprofen, one and all. The lengths to which all entrants go to promote brand identity at the expense of pharmaceutical candor are discomfiting indeed.

Of course, this is the classic dilemma of marketing a commodity product, to which patent medicines are no less invulnerable than, say, Green Giant. Both need to communicate heritage and intangible national-brand dependability to compete against identical, lower-price house brands.

But there's a big difference between drugs and frozen peas.

In the confluence of our magnificent free market with the imperative of public health, we've come not very far from the snake oil salesman. This is the intractable, sick headache of national advertising . . . a headache so bad it shows. □

Nike bashers

Deutsch, who added that neither his agency nor his client, a division of Jack Schwartz Shoes, has had any reaction from Nike. "There's nothing disparaging we're doing beyond what a Coke/Pepsi would do."

"It reminds me of how RC cola always wanted to get in the way of Pepsi and Coke," Reebok VP-Marketing Services David Ropes said of the British Knights campaign.

British Knights plans to add new executions in the fall to the campaign that will run nationally on Fox Broadcasting Co. and cable's MTV: Music Television and regionally on two of the Big 3 networks.

Nike, which holds 28.4% of the market, traditionally uses its roster of star athletes to convey a pure performance message in its advertising. Its latest campaign, for the Air 180 running shoe, draws on that sports heritage.

The current spate of Nike bashing has been fraught with network rejections and potential legal action.

A Nike source said the company had considered taking legal action against Reebok for the unauthorized use of the names of Nike's athlete/presenters. The Reebok ads feature that brand's athlete/endorsers advising Nike athlete/endorsers, by first name only, to "Pump up and air out."

Instead, Nike for now is betting that the Reebok effort will alienate consumers, as did the previous ill-fated "U.B.U." campaign and bungee-jumper TV spot.

But, said Reebok's Mr. Ropes, "the retailer is loving [the new campaign] and the consumer is loving it. It's making a hell of an impact."

Lois/GGK, New York, created the "Pump up and air out" spots.

Reebok's marketing budget will rise to $100 million this year with ad spending increasing to $70 million, up 40% over last year, Mr. Ropes said. Nike spends about $100 million annually on advertising, via Wieden & Kennedy, Portland, Ore.

In addition to Nike's concern about the Reebok ads, CBS-TV rejected both L.A. Gear's and Asics' "hot air" spots as unfairly disparaging Nike (AA, Feb. 4).

Asics first used the line last summer in a spot that ended, "Anything more is a lot of hot air." ABC refused to air the spot.

On last month's Super Bowl telecast, however, ABC accepted L.A. Gear's commercial for its new Catapult shoe, in which basketball star Karl Malone says, "Everything else is just hot air."

In a statement, Asics said it's asking for compensation from ABC for keeping its spot off the air all that time and now accepting a spot that says almost the same thing. The company is also considering action against L.A. Gear for allegedly copying its tagline, said Nancy Larsen, Asics director of public relations.

Bozell, Los Angeles, handles Asics; BBDO Worldwide created the Catapult ads.

Asics' newest spot, breaking early next month, eschews competitive claims and focuses instead on a humorous dialogue between Isiah Thomas of the Detroit Pistons and his mother.

Not everyone is taking up the cudgel against Nike these days.

Adidas and Converse, the No. 4 and No. 5 players in the market, respectively, are also taking the high road.

Adidas in March will break a new campaign for its Equipment line focusing on the basics of sports (AA, Feb. 18).

Converse will spend $22 million this year on advertising carrying the theme, "It's what's inside that counts." TV spots created by Ingalls, Quinn & Johnson, Boston, feature National Basketball Association stars Larry Bird, Magic Johnson and Bernard King and Boston rock band the Bostones.

"We need to focus on ourselves," said Gordon Tucker, Converse's senior VP-marketing. "I don't see the value of Nike bashing at this point." □ show teens in situations where they have pent-up hunger and Fritos provides the solution. Ads are themed "Muncha buncha Fritos right now," the "right now" giving a sense of urgency to the well-known tagline developed in the late '60s by former Fritos agency Young & Rubicam, New York.

In one spot, two boys in a classroom are being taunted by friends outside, enjoying bags of Fritos. The boys find a way to get out of the classroom to get to the Fritos.

In the other commercial, the same two boys are shown in a school bus.

When Non-Stop Nacho Cheese Fritos roll out, the introduction will be backed by two :30 radio spots and a tag at the end of the TV spots.

Heavy in-store sampling is part of the program.

"The interesting thing is that Fritos has very little direct competition," Mr. O'Leary said. "But there is more variety in the category than ever before, and that's where Fritos needs to interact. Our challenge will be to retain our loyal consumers and continue to gain share with an up-and-coming younger consumer." □

Auto ads show January spark

Automobile advertising in general ranked first in Advertising Age's monthly survey of advertising awareness, marking its second month in the top spot. Pepsi-Cola was second in the January poll, with the Gulf War coming in third. Heavy new coverage of the war prompted consumers to rank it third in advertising awareness. Awareness is measured by a telephone survey of 1,000 adults who are asked to list advertising that comes to mind from all advertising that is seen, heard or read in the past 30 days. Margin of error is plus or minus 3.1%.

BBDO quits L.A. Gear

LOS ANGELES—BBDO Worldwide last week resigned the creative portion of L.A. Gear's $68 million advertising and promotion account just nine weeks and one Super Bowl spot after winning the business. Agency executives said they quit because L.A. Gear wouldn't pursue a new creative style and re-edited the Catapult shoe commercial that aired during the Super Bowl. The re-editing added the line, "Everything else is just hot air," and BBDO said L.A. Gear had been warned competitor Asics had used a similar line. L.A. Gear Exec VP Sandy Saemann said the company was shocked by the resignation and had exercised its prerogative to override some BBDO creative decisions. It's likely L.A. Gear will return to producing all its creative work in-house; Vitt Media buys media.

Wella to merge accounts

DARMSTEDT, Germany—Haircare giant Wella AG is close to picking an international agency to handle its consolidated $53 million pan-European advertising account, agency sources said. Contenders are BBDO Worldwide, TBWA Worldwide and Frankfurt agency Die Gruppe, Wella's main agency in Germany, the sources said. The move is expected to be gradual, not resulting in the immediate firing of local agencies Wella now uses in Europe, including Butterfield Day De-

Military launches ads

By Steven W. Colford

GULF CRISIS

WASHINGTON—The U.S. Army, armed with new creative that plays to swelling patriotism, is returning to network TV advertising less than 72 hours after President Bush ordered a cease-fire in Operation Desert Storm. The first ads were scheduled to run this past weekend.

The U.S. Marine Corps also was scheduled for a weekend resumption of paid network TV advertising, with new creative as well as a reworked commercial modified to take into account the pro-U.S. sentiment stoked by the Persian Gulf War.

The army ads "are patriotic in nature to reinforce the confidence that the American people feel in the Army today," said Col. John Myers, director of advertising and publicity at the U.S. Army Recruiting Command. The Army decided to get back on TV soon after President Bush's national address Feb. 27, he said.

The new 30-second spot, titled "Count on Me," consists of "quick cuts of soldiers in the field" with an accompanying song that

Wary marketers, media uncertain if peace means prosperity

An Advertising Age roundup

The decisive U.S.-led victory in the Persian Gulf War has left marketers puzzling over whether renewed patriotism and confidence will translate into an economic upturn.

or boost ad spending as a result of the war's end, except for the travel industry.

U.S. automakers, the largest advertisers, are optimistic the end of the war will lead to a rebound in sales, though predictions vary on how quickly the industry will recover from its worst slump in a decade.

"Dealers tell us business is getting better," said Mark Hutchins, general sales manager for Ford Motor Co.'s Lincoln-Mercury Division.

In the past few weeks, he said, showroom traffic has been up 30% to 40% from the November-December depths.

Ford economists are predicting a gradual rise in industry sales starting in May or June, but Mr. Hutchins said he believes the comeback could be quicker.

"When our fellows and gals come back home, this whole country is going to have a good feeling and I think it's going to bode well," he said.

Underlying economic problems, however, could undermine the positive feelings, said Theodor Cunningham, exec VP-sales and marketing at Chrysler Corp.

"You've got an airline industry that's really sick and a car industry that had a terrible fourth quarter. . . . You've got a banking industry under some extreme pressure," Mr. Cunningham said. "I think there's an awful lot that's got to be done

Kuwait shops gearing up

By Laurel Wentz

The liberation of Kuwait last week by U.S.-led forces is liberating another group: ad agencies.

"We're in a celebratory mood," said Ramzi Raad, exec VP of Dubai-based Intermarkets Advertising, a Middle East ad group.

■ Could Iraq be the next hot ad market?—P. 48

Mr. Raad said his group definitely plans to reopen Intermarkets Kuwait, but the first priority is finding out if the half-dozen staffers, including some top executives, who stayed in Kuwait are safe.

Since the Iraqi invasion, he's been sending weekly fax reports to clients such as Procter & Gamble Co., Nissan Motor Co. and Citizen watches.

"We've never stopped updating our [multinational] clients outside the area that the situation will get back to normal and there will be a Kuwait again," Mr. Raad said.

He predicted the first advertising opportunities in Kuwait will be in newspapers and magazines because Kuwaiti publishing companies have been operating in exile and can resume publication without difficulty.

"I suspect the TV station was hit during hostilities," he said. "It will take some time to get back to normal."

Mr. Raad said local advertisers ran page ads in Persian Gulf newspapers Feb. 28 congratulating the Kuwaitis on their victory.

Meanwhile, some marketers are already starting to look at disrupted launches and ad campaigns.

Chrysler Corp. had scheduled a pan-Gulf launch of Dodge passenger cars and Attack our own problems

I found Rance Crain's column, "War to make for better plowshares" (AA, Feb. 14), thoroughly repulsive.

Yes, war brings out many things. But I certainly don't think the two issues he chose to focus on—our national manufacturing potential and our consumer rights—are among the top hundred.

First of all, look into our past and you'll see that the only thing consumers really think about after a war is making babies.

Secondly, he's probably among the few who would have the audacity to say, "Gee, if American missiles work so well, why can't American cars?"

It seems to me he has a hard time admitting, or accepting, that the military is our No. 1 product. And being that you can't defend a country with fancy cars and VCRs, it seems most of us—at least those of us who matter—welcome this technological trade-off.

As for his attack on the press, does telling us about what has happened (not what will happen) or about opposing viewpoints threaten our military effort?

I only wish we would attack our own problems with as much enthusiasm as we're attacking Iraq.

College days

I enjoyed James Brady's college days column (AA, Jan. 21) and agree with its sentiments. I worked all the way through college (and part of high school) and suffered no illness of the body or spirit.

In the column, though, Brady indicates that Harry Blair went into Normandie during World War II. I'm sure he landed at Normandy, unless, of course, the grand ocean liner was moored nearby.

Wes Hasden
Assistant to the publisher
Chattanooga (Tenn.) Times

The college days piece illustrates exactly how today's teenagers and young adults view a college education—as a God-given right rather than a commodity that should be purchased or earned by the individual. I guess Brady hit on a nerve with me, because I also worked my way through school. However, rather than "building my character" or helping me "appreciate it more" (I heard those lines a thousand times from my parents and friends), working my way through school made me somewhat bitter—bitter because my long hours affected my grade point, bitter because my sorority sisters seemed to have it so much easier, bitter I guess even at today's personnel directors who take college degrees for granted and forget that those degrees aren't available to everyone.

So, yes, I can relate to Brady's wonderment toward Kelly's cries of "Poor me." People like that should get off their lazy butts and earn their way. Geez, he should be grateful that he was only looking at a thousand dollars in expenses—that's an easy summer job's worth of wages, if you ask me.

Mary Ryan
St. Louis

I am dismayed by Mr. Brady's apparent outrage that this student receives a $250 scholarship and another grant for an unspecified amount. . . . He does not have a part-time job but spends his leisure time working on the Black Exchange, a campus magazine. What is so terrible about this? . . . I'd rather have him getting experience working on a student publication than making $5 an hour working at a fast-food restaurant. Which do you think will give him the more valuable, marketable experience he'll need in the real world?

With all the money spent on various programs in this country, I certainly don't resent it if my tax dollars go toward scholarships such as these.

Void where exhibited

Before Bob Garfield reviews the current Cadillac Leasing TV spot, may I nominate it for the "Mouse Type of the Year Award"?

This network :30 has, according to my count, 115 words of legal disclaimers which take up the lower half of the screen and four frame changes! Add to this another 18 words of supers over pretty basic stock footage and an announcer voice-over and you watch this thing and wonder, "What the hell was that?"

I had this gem on tape, so I had the disclaimers transcribed:

A. You must take delivery out of dealer stock. First month's lease payment of $499, plus $500 refundable security deposit for a total of $999 due at lease signing.

B. Other fees may be applicable at lease signing including GMAC acquisition fee, tax, license, title fees and insurance. Example assumed a dealer fixed capitalized cost reduction of $3,630.

C. Mileage charge of 10 cents per mile over 45,000. Payments may be slightly higher in Alabama, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Texas and Virginia. Lessee pays for excessive wear and use. GMAC must approve lease.

D. Example Sedan de Ville: $32,191 MRSP, includes destination charge. Option to purchase at lease end for $15,591. See your participating dealer for qualification details. Total of payments is $17,964.

C'mon Cadillac—show some real Cadillac Style and give your advertising back to your copywriters and not your attorneys!

Eliminate political ads

While Ron Kaatz's plan to clean up candidates' commercials (Forum, AA, Feb. 4) has merit, it doesn't go far enough. Why not eliminate political ads on TV altogether? Give each candidate an hour and a half of prime time to be used in half-hour segments any time he/she chooses before the election.

To compare political ads with those of beer, fast-food or automotive companies is doing a disservice to beer, fast-food and automotive companies who are far more respectful of the intelligence of the public than the people behind political campaigns.

Bernbach

present—wanted to talk about what had happened and their own theories of why. Especially to an old insider. It was a time of white hot fury that could not long be sustained. I tried to catch it, on tape, at its peak, over the weeks that followed.

As I went on gathering material on the collapse, my Bernbach file folders grew fatter, and spilt over into subdivisions, which in turn pushed out into new folders.

The story I had set out to research—for all its sensational disclosures—began to seem less compelling than the portrait building in my files. Who, in a year or two, would care about those last few years of betrayals and money grabs? The players in the final act would not long be remembered.

On the other hand, the advertising world would always remember Bill Bernbach.

• • • •

Ned Doyle to the contrary, everything pointed to a biography of Bernbach. Everything except my heart. I copied out the words of Katherine Anne Porter's biographer, who wrote of being emotionally disconcerted by "the uneasy sense, inhibiting rigorous investigation, that the revelations about her life constituted some cruel kind of exposure."

I supposed that Bernbach's spirit rested content with the final portrait of his legendary self. No one knew better than I how watchful he had been of his image. He kept its care entirely in his own hands. He dealt with the press as he chose. I handled the agency's public relations, not his, and my efforts to coordinate the two were not encouraged. He would pick up the phone and call The New York Times or Advertising Age and speak his mind on a sticky agency story, whatever PR strategy we'd hammered out with clients and lawyers. So, messy moments resulted for the agency posture. (The press, flattered by his calls, admired him more than ever.) So, we pulled our hair. It was his agency. And wasn't he the master in the art of communication?

And it was his image. And he seemed to have very firm ideas about what it should—and should not—encompass. He would talk to an interviewer with joyous excitement about advertising, about the art of persuasion. But an icy blue stare would cut off any attempts by the writer to get behind the ideas, to the man himself. Even a question about his work habits was over the line to Bernbach. If such reactions struck me as excessive, I quickly learned to accommodate to them. He'd attained legendary status long before I came on the scene. He'd achieved that while relentlessly guarding his privacy. I might dare to "take him on" in some areas, but not in his determination to keep the "personal" from spilling into the press.

Yet one could never be sure just where Bernbach drew his lines. For example: As his 65th birthday approached, I proposed a gathering of all of Bernbach's creative offspring, past and present, the most remarkable collection of talent in advertising history. I could imagine no greater tribute. Nor a more powerful visualization of Bernbach's dominant impact on the industry.

Immediately, his closest associates assured me that Bernbach would never agree to inviting former DDB art directors and copywriters. What? Why not? Eyes rolled incredulously at my density. Surely I was aware of Bernbach's unforgiving feelings towards those of his people who had taken jobs with competitors, or started their own agencies. I'd better leave it alone, they warned. I couldn't, so strongly did I feel about my proposal. I took it to Bernbach, who unhesitatingly approved—although he crossed a few names off the list I'd drawn up. The resulting event, a triumphant celebration, deserves a place of its own in this story, illuminating an unexpected passage in the fathers-and-sons saga of Bernbach's life.

The experience taught me that his closest associates had no more idea than I had of Bernbach's "off-limits." Yet that didn't stop them from trying hard to protect him. From . . . what? □

Changes in shopping trends

The bloom is off department store beauty aisles.

While still the most frequented outlet for women's beauty aids, their share of cosmetics, skincare and fragrance shoppers is declining. An Advertising Age/Gallup Organization survey of 1,012 adults found 19% of women have changed their shopping patterns for such products in the past two years, with department stores losing the most customers.

GALLUP SURVEY

Thirty percent of those women who have started to shop elsewhere for beauty aids cite department stores as their primary source today, down from 38% just two years ago.

The news is better for large discount stores, cosmetic specialty stores, drugstores, supermarkets and mail-order/distribution companies, which all gained up to 3% more beauty aids shoppers.

Quality is the driving force behind beauty aids purchasing decisions for 67% of women—significantly more than the 55% of men who cite quality as the most important factor for grooming products. Price comes in a distant second, with 19% of women and 22% of men citing that as most important.

Department stores in fight of their lives

By Laurie Freeman

For prestige cosmetics and fragrances, there's more than one war going on right now.

The economic recession, Persian Gulf War and troubled department store environment have eroded consumers' enthusiasm for shopping. At the same time, marketers of upscale beauty aids also are facing competition from an increasing number of distribution outlets.

Specialty cosmetics and body-care boutiques such as The Body Shop, deep discount chains such as Cosmetics Center and specialty apparel shops like The Limited and Benetton all are eroding department stores' share of cosmetics and fragrance sales (see story on Page 32).

"Consumers are aware of the deterioration of the selection of goods in department stores," says Carl Steidtmann, VP-chief economist, Management Horizons, a retail consultancy. "There are now plenty of other channels . . . for similar goods."

That shoppers are finding other outlets is evident in the results of a recent Advertising Age/Gallup Organization telephone survey of 1,012 adults, which indicates more and more consumers have been shop-hopping for beauty aids in the past two years.

The survey found 19% of women and 12% of men no longer shop in the same stores for beauty aids and grooming products as they did two years ago. Department stores are getting hit the hardest.

Thirty percent of those women who have changed shopping patterns for cosmetics, skincare and fragrances cite department stores as their primary source for such products, down from 38% two years ago. As for men, 18% of shop-hoppers frequent department stores today for skincare, fragrances and shaving products vs. 20% in 1989.

Other stores have benefited from the changes in consumer shopping patterns. Large discounters, cosmetic specialty stores, drugstores, supermarkets and mail-order/distribution companies all have gained up to 3% more shoppers since 1989.

The distribution revolution

Edited by Adrienne Ward

There is further evidence of the troubles facing department stores and prestige cosmetics and fragrance brands: declining market share. In 1990, department stores accounted for a 19% share of estimated cosmetics sales of $2.5 billion (in manufacturers' dollars), down from a 24% share of $1.2 billion in 1986, says Prudential Securities analyst Andrew Shore.

During the same five-year period, drugstore cosmetic sales grew three percentage points to a 35% share.

Some prestige cosmetics lines are trying to curb the erosion by implementing new marketing and advertising strategies.

One of the more innovative attempts comes from prestige category leader Estee Lauder Cos., which is tapping into the growing environmental consciousness of consumers and going after younger women with its Origins Natural Resources division. Origins will open its first free-standing boutique in Boston in July and is expanding to additional department stores.

The products take a natural positioning similar to The Body Shop and are considerably less expensive than Lauder's other brands.

Charles of the Ritz, in response to the recession, is trying to attract a broader customer base by taking a strong price/value position this spring with its new Ritz Express cosmetics and treatment line. Magazine ads, created by Tarlow Advertising, New York, promote prices in the $8 to $15 range.

"It's a minimalist approach with regard to the number of products used, the packaging and the affordable, pared-down prices," says Holly Clothier-Mercer, VP-marketing, Charles of the Ritz. "We're offering the consumer a different point of view that heretofore she's not had in the department store."

The moves by Lauder and Revlon's Charles of the Ritz are significant, industry experts say, and likely will influence other marketers to follow suit.

"You can't just repackage a line to reflect a recession," says consultant Allan Mottus of Mottus & Associates. "But it would serve [marketers] well to look at price/value" positionings.

John Horvitz, a principal in the Horvitz & Appel Associates consultancy, believes retailers and prestige marketers should develop programs that ensure brand loyalty, such as creating preferred customer lists, frequent-customer clubs and telemarketing.

Marshall Field's is building customer lists by placing "bounce back" cards over page ads in Chicago for Prescriptives and Shiseido. The cards invite consumers to visit those counters for a free sample.

"The key was the customer had to bring the card back to the store herself to get the sample; she couldn't mail it in," says Sandra Jaffa, New York regional manager for Chicago and Texas Monthly.

A similar promotion for Estee Lauder that ran last year in Texas Monthly posted a 2.5% response rate from insertion of 300,000 cards. Ms. Jaffa says between 50% and 90% of consumers returning the cards were new customers.

"Despite all the bad news, the opportunity exists to make [cosmetics] departments look more like perfumeries or boutiques, make the atmosphere more soft-sell and less intimidating," says Wendy Liebmann, president of WSL Marketing, a retail consultancy. "No woman wants to be spritzed anymore. She wants to feel she's in a special place, seeing things she doesn't see elsewhere."

Industry consultants believe prestige marketers in the '90s will become more choosy in determining which retailers will carry their lines.

"The key [for the marketer] is to limit the number of brands and devote greater attention to those brands," says Dorothy Foster, president of consultancy DCF International. "When every department store has the same merchandise, it then becomes a matter of who's offering the better deal. That's not the way to build business anymore." □

Nets get shock in FCC battle

By Steven W. Colford and Joe Mandese

WASHINGTON—The Federal Communications Commission will end one of the most controversial chapters in its history this week by revising regulations that restrict the Big 3 TV networks' ability to produce and sell programming.

But network executives now fear the commission majority on March 14 will come down on the studios' side, allowing liberalized though limited rights. Early last week, it was widely believed the majority would come down solidly on the side of the networks.

That switch "was a stunning shock to most people," said a high-level network executive.

At stake for the networks: an opportunity to share in the estimated $5.4 billion global syndication market, now dominated by studios and syndicators.

Trapped between the factions in the decadelong battle has been the advertising industry, loath to alienate either the networks or the studios by choosing sides.

There are pluses and minuses for advertisers, said Joe Ostrow, worldwide media director for Foote, Cone & Belding Communications, New York.

"The upside is that . . . if the networks get another revenue stream coming out of their programming activities, that will

Mini-CDs star in huge summer promotion

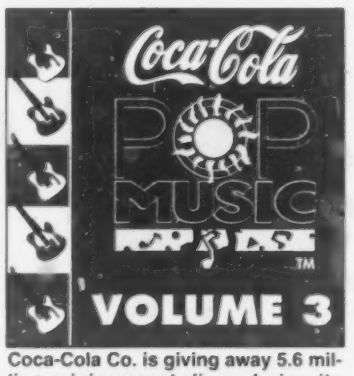
By Alison Fahey

In one of the biggest promotions ever to hit the cola wars, Coca-Cola USA will invest an estimated $100 million in a "Pop Music" program tied in with Sony Music.

Advertising will be an integral part of the summerlong effort, in which the Sony recording artists featured on compact disc giveaways might appear in TV commercials.

"Pop Music" will be backed by the "most comprehensive" ad campaign Coca-Cola has ever used to support a promotion, said Steve Koonin, director of entertainment marketing and national promotions.

"We are looking at using some of the artists involved in the promotion in our advertising," he said.



Coca-Cola Co. is giving away 5.6 million minicompact discs during its "Pop Music" summer promotion with Sony Music.

Pepsi-Cola Co. is also gearing up for a summer promotional blitz, which one source said involves a musical tie-in.

Gary Gerdemann, a Pepsi spokesman, wouldn't provide details, saying, "We traditionally do some great things during the summer, and this will be no exception."

Coca-Cola's promotion will offer 5.6 million minicompact discs inside specially marked multipacks of Coca-Cola Classic, Diet Coke and Sprite.

Nineteen acts star on four different CDs, which include music ranging from country to rap.

In addition to the CDs, some 100 million certificates redeemable for audiocassettes with $1 will be included in the multipacks. Every specially marked multipack will contain either a CD or certificate offer.

McDonald's takes nip at supermarkets

By Scott Hume

Battling to rebuild domestic sales, McDonald's Corp. is signaling a willingness to take on supermarkets and convenience stores.

In one restaurant in Bloomington, Minn., the fast-food leader is testing McExtras, a refrigerated case containing such basic grocery items as milk, eggs, bread and margarine for sale at the counter or drive-through.

The feature is intended to meet the competition posed by convenience and grocery stores, both of which are increasing their sales of prepared foods and which now account for more than 20% of the takeout market.

At the same time, McDonald's is protecting its flank in the restaurant industry by opening the first of several planned double drive-through restaurants.

The unit, in Raleigh, N.C., is less expensive to build and operate than a standard McDonald's, has no counter or seating and sells a limited menu through two tandem drive-through windows on the same side of a preparation/cashier building.

The double drive-through concept has already caught the eye of fast-food rivals

"McDonald's really has always thought of the competition as anyone who sells food. They're looking to . . . get a greater share of the overall food dollar. . . ."

PepsiCo, whose Taco Bell subsidiary bought the Hot'n Now chain, and Arby's, which acquired the Daddy-O's Express Drive-Thru chain as a second concept for its franchisees.

Both tests represent possible solutions to some of the problems faced by McDonald's, which has seen domestic real per-store sales

Next seeks shop

REDWOOD CITY, Calif.—Next Inc. plans to conduct a review after Ammirati & Puris, New York, resigned the computer workstation marketer's $2 million-plus account. Ammirati cited a conflict with Nikon's electronic imaging technology. The agency picked up Nikon's $12 million to $15 million account in December.

Wella goes with BBDO

DARMSTADT, Germany—Wella named BBDO Europe to handle the haircare giant's consolidated $53 million pan-European account, BBDO executives said. Wella executives Friday wouldn't confirm the win, saying no contract has been signed yet. The business, to be consolidated gradually, had been split among several shops (see earlier story on Page 22). BBDO is expected to have to resign two rival haircare accounts, Schwarzkopf's $15 million German account and the $20 million Alberto-Culver business in the U.K.

Marketers welcome home troops

Promos help say 'thanks'

An Advertising Age roundup

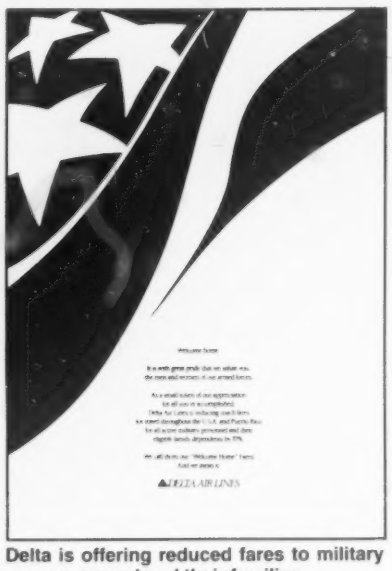
Airline, automobile and hotel marketers last week seized the lead in publicly welcoming U.S. troops home from the Persian Gulf and offering them free gifts and services.

Delta Air Lines was the first carrier to offer special 70% discount fares to all military personnel and their dependents, after which other airlines quickly matched the promotion.

Delta launched its "Welcome Home" fares to all active military personnel and their dependents. The offer provides round-trip travel at prices 70% below regular coach fares to more than 230 cities in the U.S., Hawaii, Alaska and Puerto Rico, through Sept. 30, 1991.

America West Airlines said it would give every military passenger on the carrier's charter flight home from Saudi Arabia two free round-trip tickets anywhere it flies in the U.S.

The airline is also offering special "Thanks" fares to all military personnel and their dependents at 70% discounts off regular prices. Continental Airlines went so far as to paint two 10-foot-high yellow ribbons on two Boeing 747 jets used to transport service members back from Operation Desert Storm. The airline is also offering the 70% discounts on its "Yellow Ribbon" fares.



Delta is offering reduced fares to military personnel and their families. . . .

Trans World Airlines matched the special military promotion with its "Yellow Ribbon-Patriot" fares.

United Airlines offered families the discounts of up to 70% off coach fares on continental U.S. flights.

United last week also announced it would extend a continental U.S. 70% discount for military personnel to Hawaii as part of a program with the state of Hawaii to boost Hawaiian tourism.

Northwest Airlines, along with the 70% U.S. fare cuts, is offering a 25% discount to families and friends of servicemen on travel to Frankfurt to meet with loved ones.

Marketers are putting out the welcome mat for U.S. troops returning from the Persian Gulf. Soldiers will find deals on airfares, cars and hotel stays.

The automakers aren't far behind the airlines in honoring the troops.

General Motors Corp. is exploring a number of special programs to honor returning GM employees, and U.S. servicemen generally. One report, later denied, had the company offering a special purchase incentive for its 350 reservists called to active duty during the Gulf crisis.

Also, GM and the United Auto Workers are jointly sponsoring a TV commercial saluting U.S. troops, and the men and women of GM and the UAW who were called to military duty during the Middle East crisis.

The 30-second spot, which will air in a total of 20 markets through March 23, broke last week in Detroit.

Ford Motor Co. is offering all U.S. servicemen and women on active duty in any branch of the military worldwide a discount on any 1990-1992 Ford and Mercury-branded vehicles. It's not limited to those who served in the Persian Gulf, a Ford spokesman said.

The discount—4% above dealer cost—also is being offered to immediate families of those on active duty in the military. The program runs from March 1 to Dec. 31. Those who qualify for the discount, but purchased cars before the program became known to dealers, will get a rebate check equal to the price difference, the spokesman said.

"We estimate that there are ~ million military people who qualify for this," he added. "This is Ford's way of saying thanks for a job well done."

Chrysler Corp. last December began offering $500 rebates to servicemen and women serving in the Gulf and their families. Chrysler is running that program through May.

Toyota Motor Sales USA doesn't have any corporate promotions to returning military personnel, but local dealers have their own programs. One Georgia dealer created a Valued Military Personnel program, which gives a 15% discount on parts, service and rental cars to members of the armed forces and their families.

Hotels aren't far behind other marketers in the postwar scramble.

Sheraton Corp. is offering a weekend night stay in the continental U.S. to U.S. military personnel returning from the Gulf war. The "Sheraton R&R Weekend Night" offer is valid April 12 through March 8, 1992.

A "major marketing promotion" for the troops was set to be implemented today by Hilton Hotels Corp. but was only in its "formative stages" by midmorning Friday, said James Boyd, media relations coordinator. He declined to divulge details.

Westin Hotels & Resorts is giving a 75% discount to all military personnel at the Walt Disney World Swan hotel after concluding it would be difficult to sort out only troops returning from the Persian Gulf, said David Jimenez, a Westin spokesman.

Disney is promoting the offers through military bases.

In addition, Disney World's daily Zip-a-Dee Doo-Dah parade will soon be led by a new, patriotic float. The park in May will begin staging several patriotic shows, including red, white and blue fireworks.

Top TV advertisers beef up spending

By Joe Mandese

NEW YORK—The top 10 network TV advertisers increased total spending by 14% last year to about $3.2 billion, according to new data from Arbitron Co.'s Broadcast Advertisers Reports.

The increase from 1989 figures came during a year when total network ad spending increased only 6%, indicating a consolidation of spending power among the top 10.

The data also showed the top 10 increased their share of network TV ad spending by 2.2 percentage points to 31.4% of the $10.2 billion spent by all advertisers.

That consolidation of buying clout is noteworthy because the number of marketers using network TV actually increased 4.3% to 633 in 1990. That number had been declining since 1986.

The leading network TV advertiser, General Motors Corp., outpaced the medium's growth average by raising its outlays 18% to $598.4 million.

That put GM at nearly a 6% share of all network spending. Not far behind was No. 2 Procter & Gamble Co., which boosted its network budget 24% to $557.6 million.

AT&T Co. posted the biggest increase of a top network advertiser—up 51% to $244.9 million, largely due to a 53.8% increase in prime-time spending to $157.6 million and a 470.5% increase in daytime to $13.6 million.

GM increased spending in prime time by 18.5% to $417.1 million and in daytime by 99.1% to $20.9 million.

P&G, the No. 1 daytime advertiser, hiked daytime spending 11.1% to $190.2 million but boosted primetime spending 28.5% to $287.0 million and Saturday/Sunday daytime 109.2% to $31.2 million.

The most notable declines in network TV were Unilever U.S., down 14% to $162.9 million, and Anheuser-Busch Cos., down 29% to $129 million. The companies ranked No. 15 and No. 19, respectively, in network advertising.

Both Warner-Lambert Co. (No. 24) and Coca-Cola Co. (No. 25) were down 10%, to $91.1 million and $88.9 million, respectively, but each company appreciably increased spending in national syndication and national spot TV.

Warner-Lambert boosted syndication 96% to $48.4 million and its spot TV 52% to $35.9 million.

Coca-Cola raised syndication 85% to $34.1 million and spot TV 10% to $75 million. □

McExtras

averages decline for 10 consecutive quarters, according to Prudential Securities.

Those problems include the growth of at-home eating, to which competitors such as Domino's Pizza and Pizza Hut are responding; increased takeout food sales at convenience and grocery stores; scarcity of prime sites for full-scale restaurants; and labor shortages in some markets.

"McDonald's really has always thought of the competition as anyone who sells food," but they're acting on that differently now, said Henry D'Auria, restaurant analyst at PaineWebber. "They're looking to see if they can get a greater share of the overall food dollar through their stores.

"The double drive-through test also is a way to see how you provide that convenient, prepared meal at the lowest cost. They're following where consumer dollars are going."

One part of McDonald's push to rebuild domestic sales has been its continual testing of a wide variety of possible new menu items. These include pizza (to counter pizza chains), submarine sandwiches (to meet the growth of Subway Sandwiches and others), McFish Fry and Fish & Chips (countering Long John Silver's, Captain D's Restaurant and others), and burritos and fajitas (in response to Taco Bell and Mexican dinnerhouses).

But other restaurants aren't McDonald's only competitors and may not be its toughest challenge.

McDonald's has proved it can respond to and often thwart the challenges restaurant rivals throw in its way, but convenience stores and supermarkets pose a different problem.

Restaurants account for the majority of the total market for prepared takeout foods, representing 78.1% of the $63.5 billion market in 1989, according to market researcher Find/SVP. But that's been dropping, from 80.4% in 1986. This year it's projected to hit 77.6%.

Gaining share at restaurants' expense are convenience stores (9.2%) and supermarkets (12.7%).

Find/SVP projects the takeout market will grow to $88.7 billion in 1994, and supermarkets' share will increase to 16.5% then, at the expense of restaurants.

With McExtras, McDonald's is testing whether it can recapture customers it may have been losing to those non-restaurant competitors.

At its counter or drive-through windows, customers can buy milk, eggs, yogurt, bread, buns or margarine, as well as standard fare. Those groceries are displayed inside the restaurant in a refrigerated case near cashiers. Indoor and outdoor signage promotes the feature as "Groceries on the go."

Co-op agency Carmichael Lynch, Minneapolis, created the collateral materials, but an undisclosed amount of McDonald's corporate marketing funds has been channeled to the store to underwrite the project.

McExtras was added to the store in late January.

"This is really in its infancy. It hardly even qualifies as a test," said Joe Talcott, VP-management supervisor at Carmichael Lynch. The idea, he said, is that customers "can order a Big Mac and a half-gallon of milk."

The restaurant McDonald's chose for the McExtras feature is flanked by a PDQ convenience store and Country Club Market grocery store.

The Raleigh double drive-through is 1,212 square feet, less than a third the size of the average 4,500-square-foot outlet, and requires a total staff of 35, compared with the average of 65.

The menu has been simplified, excluding salads, breakfast entrees such as pancakes and some other items.

What it does have is hot dogs, standard fare at many convenience stores, as well as other test items such as curly french fries (a big seller at Southeast rival Hardee's Food Systems).

Local radio and signage for that store are themed "Driving it home." Price/McNabb, Raleigh, handles.

"McDonald's corporate challenged each region to come up with a drive-through concept. We were the first to get ours built, but other regions will follow," said Bill Hooks, regional construction engineer for McDonald's.

Louisiana and Michigan could get the next units, he said. □

tured on the audiocassettes.

McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, the agency for Coca-Cola Classic, is handling ad support for "Pop Music," which Coca-Cola created in-house.

Mr. Koonin declined to disclose the overall budget for the promotion, but sources close to the company estimate it will cost about $100 million, with $20 million slated for media ad support.

The campaign ~~will~~ include cable and network TV, radio, print and point-of-purchase materials. The total effort will look as "fresh and hot" as the promotion itself, Mr. Koonin said.

TV support is set to break May 20.

The artists on the CDs, mostly up-and-comers, include Latin singer George LaMond, pop/soul artist Brenda K. Starr, Canadian pop singer Celine Dion, and Grammy Award-winners Shawn Colvin and Rosanne Cash.

Coca-Cola often uses music stars in its advertising. The company has featured country star Randy Travis, pop icon Elton John and teen group New Kids on the Block, to name a few.

The company said a music tie-in is a natural fit for Coca-Cola since music appeals to the youth market, the primary target for soft drinks and for No. 1 brand Coca-Cola Classic in particular.

"Pop Music" will follow Coca-Cola's highly controversial Magi-Can promotion of last summer. That promotion went sour when some of the cans containing cash and coupons malfunctioned.

"Pop Music" is the latest sign soft-drink marketers are moving away from price promotions, said Jesse Meyers, editor-publisher of Beverage Digest.

Value-added promotions "seem to be the new wave of soft-drink marketing," he said. "This is another value-added concept that is moving the industry away from reducing prices."

Mr. Meyers cited the failed Magi-Can promotion and Coca-Cola's "Toy Money" tie-in with Mattel as other examples of the trend.

"This is another value-added concept that is moving the industry away from reducing prices."

During "Pop Music," which runs from mid-May through July, one of every 19 specially marked multipacks will include a free 3-inch CD, which is compatible with most CD players. Each CD is a $4.99 value.

Coca-Cola said it would consider rolling out "Pop Music" abroad if it proves successful in the U.S.

Coca-Cola is the leader in the $46.6 billion U.S. soft-drink market with an estimated 41% share; No. 2 Pepsi-Cola has about 33%. □ of the kids market.

"I think there is more talk than action going on," he said. But he added he had some deals "working."

"This business is so teeny that it could be a trickle of business today [March 7] and by Monday morning [March 11] it could be sold out," he said.

Whether the syndication activity will encourage early network kids business isn't clear; the networks won't announce their Saturday morning schedules until early April.

Even so, net executives were optimistic about the market overall.

"I can't say there's nothing going on," said Larry Hoffner, NBC exec VP-network sales. He said that last week he was in earnest discussions about early upfront deals with "nine to 12" clients.

Of the Big 3 networks, NBC appears the most eager to stir interest in upfront deals.

Over the past month, the network said it might reduce commercial inventory and that it was returning to the traditional audience guarantee system (AA, March 4).

But agency buyers said all the networks are open to discussing early deals, particularly in light of softness in the scatter market.

While second-quarter scatter rates have improved slightly over those in the first quarter, they still remain substantially below last year's upfront. Moreover, buyers report that the networks are continuing the unusual practice of guaranteeing scatter buys.

Both are signs of network weakness, and buyers believe now is the time to cut deals at potentially favorable prices rather than wait until late spring, the traditional time for the upfront market to move. □

Hazards abound for golf books

Golf Illustrated has a way to go...

. . . but ad page share climbs

SURVIVAL TECHNIQUES

Getting out of a recessionary sand trap will require an amazing bunker shot.

After being the only one of the three major golf magazines to record an ad-page increase last year, Golf Illustrated now finds itself in the gritty sands of the distressed 1991 economy.

To get onto—and into—the green, Golf Illustrated must win over media buyers who want reach from titles in this category and say they can get it in other golf books.

"We'll weather the storm," promises Publisher Ernest Renzulli. "It's going to be a decent year, but it's unfair to expect the same gains we've made in previous years."

Golf Illustrated, owned by Family Media, emphasizes player profiles and lifestyle features. The other two books, Golf and Golf Digest, cover all aspects of the game, including playing tips, travel, news and equipment.

According to Publishers Information Bureau, Golf Illustrated recorded almost 559 ad pages in 1990, an 11.8% increase over the prior year. Although Golf and Golf Digest ran about twice as many ad pages, the books reported ad page drops of 5.9% and 3.4% in 1990, respectively.

Gains in secondary ad categories drove Golf Illustrated's increase.

"We broke a number of new ad categories in 1990 including financial services and liquor," says Mr. Renzulli.

He attributes Golf Illustrated's success so far to being "a viable alternative both editorially and from a price standpoint," to Golf and Golf Digest.

"When you're going against two formidable books, the smaller kid can't go in with a parity situation regarding out-of-pocket and [costs-per-thousand]," he says.

Currently, a one-time color page in Golf Illustrated costs $19,345, compared with $59,160 in Golf Digest and $46,235 in Golf. In addition, Golf Illustrated's CPM of $38.69 undercuts Golf Digest's $43.82 and Golf's $44.03.

Although Mr. Renzulli claims Golf Illustrated's lower out-of-pocket cost enables economy-minded advertisers to buy space in a national publication, buyers are quick to note the differences in the books' circulations.

Golf Illustrated's circulation stands at 470,027, a 4.2% hike from one year ago. However, it lags far behind Golf Digest's almost 1.4 million readers and Golf's more than 1 million.

Ernest Renzulli

As a result, some buyers consider Golf Illustrated the third book in a three-title field. This perception could jeopardize the gains made in new ad categories.

"Ad pages tend not to be the best overall judge of the health of a publication," says Irving Plonskier, supervisor of print services for Young & Rubicam, New York. Y&R has placed several non-golf advertisers, such as Holiday Inn and AT&T Co.'s long-distance service, in varying degrees in the three golf books. "You also have to consider reach."

Not only are lifestyle advertisers starting to emphasize reach, but so are marketers of golf equipment, the biggest ad category in Golf Illustrated.

"The lifestyle slant of Golf Illustrated gives advertisers a unique point of difference when compared to the how-to approach of Golf and Golf Digest," says Debbie Lisa-Brown, associate media director at N W Ayer, New York, which handles sporting goods marketer Dunlop Slazenger Corp.

But because of its smaller reach, "it's still perceived as the third book in a three-book category," she says. "In this economy, there's a chance that might mean some type of slowdown on ad pages."

What's more, golf equipment companies are holding huge amounts of unsold inventory and have reined in their ad expenditures. In 1990, Golf Illustrated's 248 pages of golf equipment advertising was down 1.8% from the year before, according to PIB. Its 1989 tally of almost 253 pages represented a 68% increase from 1988. The other golf titles showed similar 1990 results and had gains in this category of about 16% in 1989.

But Mr. Renzulli says, "Golf fanatics are still buying clubs and other game-related products. That's the core market all three titles are after."

Another potential future problem concerns Golf Illustrated's ownership. Parent company Family Media has put the title up for sale, and the "black book" of financial information on the publication reportedly does not include an asking price. This allows potential owners to make an offer for Golf Illustrated (AA, Jan. 21). Mr. Renzulli admits Golf Illustrated could be sold but declined to comment further.

Despite the concerns, Golf Illustrated is working to increase its appeal to advertisers. The book still is banking on its existing promotion programs: the Grand Slam discount package; a five-ads-for-the-price-of-four program; and specialty columns on restaurant reviews, game psychology, exercise and nutrition. For 1991, Mr. Renzulli promises more advertiser packages.

To drive circulation, Golf Illustrated recently began buying time during televised tournaments on ESPN. The book also implemented a subscription package where each potential reader is mailed two free issues and allowed to subscribe.

But whether these moves will satisfy buyers who want reach from this magazine category remains to be seen.

"Golf Illustrated is a great book, but media buyers may feel that the money doesn't go as far," Ms. Lisa-Brown says. □

Mistress of the low-brow magazine

Catherine Hughes is the tres chic editor of Chicago Weekly magazine, featured in the recently resurrected ABC-TV series "Anything but Love." She runs the magazine's newsroom with a tight, if erratic, jewelry-jangling fist. She talked with Advertising Age's Marcy Magiera about the influences on her career and the tough times facing the magazine industry.

Advertising Age: How did you become interested in the magazine business?

Ms. Hughes: It's in my genes. I always thought I should be the daughter of Donald Hollinger and Ann Marie [the main characters, played by Ted Bessell and Marlo Thomas, in ABC's 1960s series "That Girl"]. I'd have my father's passion for journalism and my mother's passion for clothes.

AA: Do you have any role models?

Ms. Hughes: Joseph Stalin, because he knew how to keep people in line, and Daffy Duck, because it's so important to inject humor into the workplace. Diana Vreeland, of course, and Kay Thompson, in that scene at the beginning of "Funny Face" where she sings "Think Pink." Though I hate pink . . . and Julie Newmar as Catwoman.

AA: What magazines do you read?

Ms. Hughes: Specialty magazines. Soldier of Fortune and Highlights for Children. But Barbie magazine is my absolute favorite on the face of the Earth. Because they teach you how to target a demographic, and that's what it's all about, isn't it?

AA: Are you concerned about the demise of other hip, upscale magazines, such as Egg and Wigwag?

Capital Cities ABC

Catherine Hughes (a.k.a. actress Ann Magnuson)

Ms. Hughes: [That's] less competition for me. . . . I'm just so upset the National Enquirer scooped us on Saddam Hussein's evil sex life. How he murders his young lovers and his passion for "Little House on the Prairie."

AA: Do you have a strategy for Chicago Weekly to ride out the current recession?

Ms. Hughes: It's important to put enough low-brow stuff in [a successful magazine]. Magazines are not for reading. You have to master the fine art of skimming to succeed in the magazine business.

AA: Did you skip the Paris fashion shows last month because of potential terrorist activity sparked by the Persian Gulf War?

Ms. Hughes: No. There's nothing I like better than to be one of six people on a jumbo jet. I can pretend I'm on Air Force One.

AA: It seems that every week there's a new magazine coming out in a video format. Can you envision a video version of Chicago Weekly?

Ms. Hughes: Oh yes, that would be great. We'd have to get the Japanese involved with that.

AA: What would you be doing if you weren't a magazine editor?

Ms. Hughes: I'd probably be running [apparel marketer] Norma Kamali. Or I'd be part of Madonna's think tank. □

Gone but not forgotten

After three straight annual ad-page increases, the magazine industry took a turn for the worse in 1990. Publishers Information Bureau reports ad pages of the titles it tracks fell 3.7% in 1990, compared with the year before.

The ad drought also felled a suprisingly high number of magazines. It's not just the weak sisters that have suffered, either. Some of these titles made the Advertising Age 300, our ranking of the leading revenue-generating publications, and several with critically acclaimed editorial or substantial circulations have fallen.

New campaign to tell HHCC's fate at Reebok

By Pat Sloan

Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos will soon present an image campaign to client Reebok International that could determine if the Boston shop keeps what it has left of the $70 million account.

The creative presentation, expected within the next two weeks, is a make or break effort for Hill Holliday; if the agency fails, the athletic shoe account could be split between Lois/GGK and Chiat/Day/Mojo, both in New York, say sources close to Reebok.

Lois/GGK now handles part of Reebok's campaign for its Pump athletic shoe. Chiat has Reebok's international business and Weeboks toddlers' shoes.

The sources also said if Hill Holliday loses the business, Reebok could give more projects to Lois/GGK, Chiat or other shops rather than officially splitting the account.

A Reebok spokeswoman would only say Hill Holliday is the company's U.S. agency of record.

Hill Holliday CEO Jack Connors said he wasn't

Can Burnett lift Lite?

Miller moves account as brand hits middle age

By Ira Teinowitz

Miller Lite, the wonder of the 1970s that created the light beer market, faces a midlife crisis longtime ad agency Backer Spielvogel Bates apparently couldn't handle.

Miller Brewing Co. last week moved the brand, which may top $75 million in media spending this year, to Leo Burnett USA, Chicago—a plum though not easy assignment.

New York-based Backer had handled Lite since the agency's founding in 1979.

■ Rick Fizdale keeps Burnett on course—P. 54.
■ Spielvogel ready to make changes—P. 55.

The problems for Miller Lite, still the nation's No. 2 beer, are that the average age of its drinkers has risen, and it seems to have lost much of its growth while light beers generally are booming.

Further, the brand has lost the distinctive identity it had when its reduced-calories character was the ground-breaker and a far cry from heavier beers.

To make matters worse for Burnett, reviving Lite will have to be done without risking Miller's own fast-growing brews—Miller Genuine Draft and new Genuine Draft

Political war ads are in the works for '92

By Steven W. Colford

"Some of our finest young men and women lost their lives on that battlefield. Was their blood shed so Republicans would have something to talk about in television political commercials?"

—U.S. Sen. Albert Gore Jr. (D., Tenn.), March 6, 1991

It's about 20 months before the 1992 elections, and the answer to Sen. Gore's question appears to be yes.

Practically from the moment President Bush called off the allies in the Persian Gulf, talk of the hay that could be made from the stunning victory was rampant in political circles.

Could Saddam Hussein and the war become the Willie Horton of 1992?

Republican political consultant Mike Murphy said he's using footage of bruised and swollen U.S. prisoners of war in some generic TV commercials for focus-group testing. Mr. Murphy said he will put together three 30-second commercials with war-related footage bought from the networks and test them in a few weeks.

"My gut tells me [war ads] will play, it's just a question of how to present them."

"The environment for testing now is still too hot," he said. "Maybe we'll test them in May. We'll feel around with the focus group to find the best way to present these messages in a campaign context."

Two of Washington-based Mike Murphy Media's U.S. Senate clients, neither of whom Mr. Murphy would identify, already had expressed interest in using war ads in their 1992 campaigns.

"My gut tells me these will play, it's just a question of how to present them," he said.

Mr. Murphy's past campaigns include Republican Sen. Jesse Helms' nasty 1984 re-election victory over North Carolina Gov. Jim Hunt, a Democrat.

"It's a very legitimate issue,"

A VOICE OF THE TIMES

When the oldest continuously published monthly magazine in America turns HOT, people in the ad community want to know why.

Why is THE ATLANTIC up 42% in ad pages for 1989 and 1990? Why has THE ATLANTIC been named to Adweek's list of "10 Hottest Magazines" for the second year in a row?

You, our advertisers, made it happen. And continue to make it happen.

- You recognize THE ATLANTIC's pre-eminent editorial as the place to get across your advertising messages.
- You see THE ATLANTIC's award-winning redesign as the place to enhance your upscale campaigns.
- You know THE ATLANTIC's audience of influential movers and shakers matters in its own right and in shaping the decision-making patterns of others.
- And you understand that now, more than ever before, THE ATLANTIC is a voice of the times.

For now is a time when what you know matters as much as what you have. And as the majority of the population (a little older and a little wiser) looks to understand the world around them, they turn to the magazine and its readers to help them make sense of that world.

THE ATLANTIC has been described as the nation's dining-room table—a place where business people, scientists, politicians, teachers, writers, members of the clergy, the military, Republicans, and Democrats can regularly hear one another speak.

The voices are often eloquent, the subjects are wide-ranging, but most important of all is who's listening.

All of this explains why more and more of you are coming to the table with your advertising messages.

THE ATLANTIC is a voice of the times—and a great place to be heard.

Shielded from recession

Can a local medium make it nationally?

By Monte Williams

When recently shopping for a clown to amuse tots at her daughter's first birthday party, Rainey Shabazz reached for the Queens Nynex Yellow Pages.

The 32-year-old homemaker, a mother of two from Jamaica, Queens, dialed four or five numbers under the "Entertainers" heading to locate the cheapest clown in town.

Ms. Shabazz didn't always research purchases so carefully.

"Three years ago, when I was planning a party for my oldest daughter, I just got out the Yellow Pages and hired the first clown in the book," she says. The sluggish economy triggered Ms. Shabazz's metamorphosis from spendthrift to bargain-hunter.

Some Yellow Pages proponents say the newfound budget awareness of consumers such as Ms. Shabazz partly explains the staying power of directories during hard times.

"During a recession, the Yellow Pages becomes a tool to save both time and money," asserts Mary MacDonald, managing director-ceo of the Yellow Pages division at D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Chicago.

"Take fluctuating gas prices. People will pull out the Yellow Pages and call different gas stations to find out what prices are on a given day instead of getting into their cars and driving 20 miles [to find the lowest-priced gasoline] in the area," she says.

"Consumers tend to research their purchases more carefully when money is in short supply," says Bob Lamb, VP-marketing and strategic planning at Telephone Marketing Programs, one of the the nation's largest Yellow Pages agencies. "And with the increase in gas prices, they'll call first," he predicts.

In an exclusive Advertising Age/Gallup Organization poll, comparison shopping was given as the No. 1 reason consumers consult the Yellow Pages (see P. S-6).

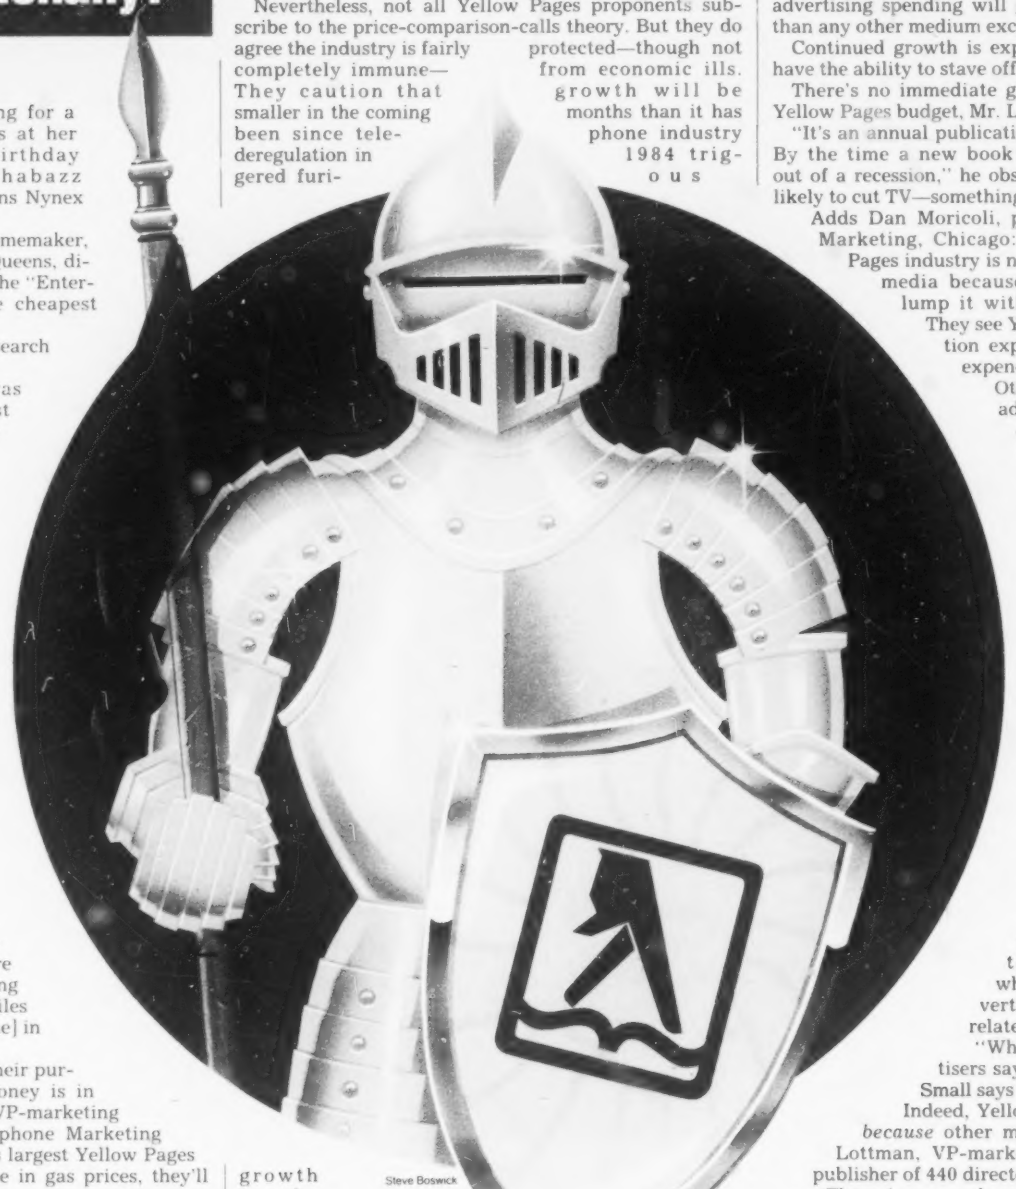
Forty percent of those surveyed said they use the Yellow Pages for comparison shopping. Another 32% said they use the Yellow Pages to find the closest business to their residence; 10% said they use it to find out store hours; and 6% say they use it for the local maps and street guides.

Five percent say they use Yellow Pages for any and all of the above reasons; another 6% said none of these reasons; 1% said they didn't know.

Nevertheless, not all Yellow Pages proponents subscribe to the price-comparison-calls theory. But they do agree the industry is fairly protected—though not completely immune—from economic ills. They caution that growth will be smaller in the coming months than it has been since telephone industry deregulation in 1984 triggered furious growth in the directory business.



Steve Boswick

"The Yellow Pages industry is somewhat recession-proof, but we've already been nipped here and there," Ms. MacDonald concedes.

"We've felt the economic downturn in New York City and Chicago [among the cities hardest hit by the recession], but less so in upstate New York and other areas of Illinois," adds Ken Johnson, president of Donnelley Directory. "In Las Vegas, Nev., central Florida and Cincinnati, we've had outstanding sales."

Few advertisers are likely to yank their ads from the Yellow Pages during a recession, Mr. Johnson says.

But the industry is jostled when marginal mom-and-pop operations hang up the "Going out of business" sign. And ad growth is stunted when fewer people open businesses, he observes, which is the case nowadays because of reductions in federal and private funding for start-ups. Those shopowner wannabes would have been Yellow Pages advertisers, he says.

Still, most industry insiders say the ad growth rate of Yellow Pages, which has recently exceeded other media, will continue to outpace newspapers, magazines and TV in the coming months.

Yellow Pages ad revenues leaped to $8.3 billion in 1989, a 6.4% increase from 1988, according to Yellow Pages Publishers Association. Directory revenues for 1990 should reach a projected $8.8 billion, a 6% jump over 1989, YPPA reports.

McCann-Erickson Worldwide predicts Yellow Pages advertising spending will grow by 6.6% in 1991, more than any other medium except direct mail.

Continued growth is expected because Yellow Pages have the ability to stave off the recessionary pinch.

There's no immediate gratification in cutting one's Yellow Pages budget, Mr. Lamb says.

"It's an annual publication with months of lead time. By the time a new book is published, we're in and out of a recession," he observes. "Advertisers are more likely to cut TV—something they can feel right away."

Adds Dan Moricoli, president of Grey Directory Marketing, Chicago: "Traditionally the Yellow Pages industry is not impacted as much as other media because advertisers don't tend to lump it with their advertising budget. They see Yellow Pages as a communication expenditure, not an advertising expenditure."

Others note the industry's core advertisers are service providers—plumbers, florists, beauty parlors, for instance—not retailers, such as large department stores, which have been hardest hit by the economic slowdown.

"Eighty-eight percent of Yellow Pages advertising revenue is locally generated," says Larry Small, YPPA's VP-marketing. "For some mom-and-pop businesses, the Yellow Pages is their only source of advertising. They aren't likely to pull out."

Though publishers' core advertisers are safe, some predict the recession will quash the industry's high hopes of attracting more national brand advertising through BrandSell, which offers package-goods advertisers product exclusivity in related categories.

"When times are tough, advertisers say 'No way' to new ideas," Mr. Small says (see related story on P. S-2).

Indeed, Yellow Pages will do well in part because other media do poorly, claims Don Lottman, VP-marketing of Southwestern Bell, publisher of 440 directories.

"There is so much media fragmentation, with direct mail, new magazines, cable TV," he says.

Moreover, directories deliver a different type of customer, Mr. Lamb notes.

"We're a directional medium, not a creative medium," he observes. "People who pick up the Yellow Pages already want to buy something. The Yellow Pages helps them decide who to spend their money with." □

Who uses Yellow Pages?

Advertisers have raised a lot of questions concerning Yellow Pages research and consumers' use of them. The lack of such information has often been cited as a reason more non-traditional Yellow Pages advertisers don't consider the medium in their buys.

AD AGE GALLUP SURVEY

To help research-seeking advertisers, Advertising Age commissioned Gallup Organization to ask consumers how many times a week they used the Yellow Pages. Their responses follow, reflected in averages and ranked in descending order.

Other highlights of our exclusive survey–detailing how specific consumer groups use the Yellow Pages and which types of Yellow Pages advertising they find most effective–appear on Page S-14.

Lack of research bursts national ad dream

Failure to implement intramedia studies holding back Yellow Pages publishers

By Patricia Strnad

The siren song of national advertising has smitten Yellow Pages publishers.

But national advertisers and their authorized selling representative (ASR) agencies have a problem listening to Yellow Pages publishers, citing the lack of third-party usage research as the medium's biggest sour note.

Such data, known as intramedia research, compare competing books and rate individual Yellow Pages directories on consumer usage.

But the need to boost national advertising is becoming acute for Yellow Pages. Local advertising, which accounted for 88% of Yellow Pages' 1989 revenue of $8.3 billion, is expected to flatten, forcing publishers to look elsewhere for revenues.

While five of the nine largest publishers subscribe to measurement services for some of their books, advertisers and Yellow Pages agencies are pushing for intramedia research industrywide —or at least in all major markets with competing directories.

The idea isn't new. Two years ago, a Yellow Pages Publishers Association task force acknowledged the merits of book-to-book comparisons but decided not to endorse such research industrywide, angering Yellow Pages advertisers.

"They're looking at it only from a publisher's perspective of how to make more money," says Marcia Greene, manager of telephone directory advertising at Roto-Rooter Services Co.

"If they want to be a credible ad medium, they need to look at providing the best product for their advertisers."

Without research, Ms. Greene says she has trouble knowing where to place ads.

"We have to spend our money wisely," she says. "The idea that advertisers have deep pockets can't continue forever."

One reason YPPA continues to give for not endorsing industrywide, intramedia research is that the number of competing markets is declining.

ASR agencies say that's true but not exactly a fair assessment. Before the breakup of AT&T Co. in 1984, publishers had monopolies in their markets. After divestiture, Bell companies and independents invaded one another's territories, resulting in explosive growth of directories.

Many directories have since failed and the industry has stabilized, but several major markets remain hotly competitive, agency executives say.

Also fueling YPPA's decision were concerns that such research would merely reallocate existing ad dollars rather than bring in additional revenue, says Larry Small, VP-marketing.

Instead, YPPA decided to move forward on syndicated intermedia research that compares and highlights the benefits of advertising in Yellow Pages vs. other media.

"The problem with that is other media start by measuring their own [usage] first," says Bettina Eichel, consumer research manager at Pacific Bell, which has subscribed to audience-measurement services for four years. "You really need a good measure of how much you're used before you can start comparing yourself to other media."

Mr. Small says many publishers still believe intramedia research won't bring in more ad revenue, but "the realities are, without that type of syndicated research, there's the possibility of market erosion. So now it's more of a defensive than an offensive tool."

The industry "is going to have to become more sophisticated in terms of data" to grow, he says.

As things stand, some advertisers won't even consider the Yellow Pages, says Blanche McGuire, senior VP-marketing resources at Ketchum Directory Advertising, Pittsburgh.

"Our clients need to be able to calculate the return on investment to justify their buys," she says. "The watchword in today's economy is 'prove it.' "

Publishers not subscribing to syndicated intramedia research argue that it's much more expensive than doing their own research.

"I'd rather explore the opportunities in intermedia research," says Kurt Roessner, director-data-base marketing at Nynex Information Resources. "I'm doing my own, less-expensive version of intramedia research, so I already know what the market's doing."

GTE Directories Corp. doesn't subscribe to syndicated intramedia research because "we don't consider what's out there now to be true syndicated research," says Cindy Johnson, marketing director.

"We consider it sponsored third-party research, which is the same thing GTE does. To us, true syndicated research is similar to what Simmons does, where the research is done no matter who buys it."

Most ASR agencies and advertisers are wary of publishers' proprietary research, arguing none has ever presented itself as second-best.

"They've put out so many proprietary studies that I don't even open them," says Leonard Pollack, director of research for Wahlstrom & Co., Stamford, Conn., Foote, Cone & Belding's Yellow Pages subsidiary. "It's just another self-promotion piece, and it won't get past my desk."

Many industry observers believe syndicated, intramedia research runs counter to the pre-divestiture Yellow Pages culture of secrecy.

"It's kind of scary to a lot of publishers to think of an outside company coming in and measuring your markets and that you can't control how they do it or what they report," Pacific Bell's Ms. Eichel says.

> "The watchword in today's economy is 'prove it.' "

But intramedia research usually confirms what a publisher already knows, says Mary Ann Packo, president of National Yellow Pages Monitor, which measures 30 major markets for more than 400 directories by Pacific Bell and BellSouth Corp.

Although Yellow Pages have a long way to go before sufficiently meeting advertiser and agency needs, most are encouraged by the growing number of publishers exploring intramedia research.

"There are more and more media choices out there," says Advertising Research Corp. Exec VP Sherrie Starr, "and if Yellow Pages wants to be up there in the top media choices, they're going to have to take that step forward." □

PEOPLE TO WATCH

As far as surveyed consumers are concerned, Yellow Pages are challenging disposable diapers as the biggest culprit threatening municipal landfills. And it's the job of Willis Hengy Sr. to make sure they don't.

Mr. Hengy is president of the Michigan Directory Co. and chairman of the Yellow Pages Publishers Association's year-old environmental committee.

"I felt it was a place where I could accomplish something and it would be worthwhile," he says of the appointment last March.

About 680,000 tons of paper each year go into Yellow Pages directories distributed nationally. If all of that paper went into landfills, it would account for less than 0.5% of the 188 million tons of garbage annually parked in dumps, Mr. Hengy estimates. Disposable diapers, by comparison, constitute about 2%.

"We consider it to be important," Mr. Hengy, 60, says.

Recycling old phone directories is a priority for the environmental committee—both because they believe it can be accomplished and because it's a way to offset any negative publicity brought on by the environmental movement.

The first major step toward making the industry "green" is to standardize the materials used for directories, including the cover, binding, paper, inks, glues and dyes, Mr. Hengy says.

Willis Hengy Sr.

"When the time comes to collect directories for recycling, there won't be any concern that any of these components from any directory company can't be recycled," he says.

The 50-member committee, composed of publishers, paper companies and printers, is asking Yellow Pages publishers to phase out petroleum-based, heavy-metal inks and switch to a vegetable, water-soluble ink. The same goes for glue. A hot-meld adhesive currently is the favorite binder, but that glue is difficult to recycle. He says water-soluble glues will solve the problem.

Although compliance is voluntary, he expects most publishers to adopt the guidelines in part because of intense industry pressure.

By 1993, directories will be printed on paper made of 10% recycled material, Mr. Hengy predicts, and will increase to 40% recycled fiber content by 1998, up from their current almost non-existent recycled material content.

But what really worries Mr. Hengy is that there won't be enough Yellow Pages books to recycle.

"People don't necessarily want to give up their old phone books. They've got phone numbers written down in it, or they want to put it in a spare bedroom or in the basement. Old directories aren't as easy to get as you think."

Mr. Hengy, a former Ford dealer, got into the telephone business in 1971, when he and a partner bought Pigeon Telephone Co. from the original founding family.

Becoming chairman of the environmental committee has heightened Mr. Hengy's environmental awareness and led to changes in his own operation. Since late last year, old directories have been sent to an area farmer to be shredded into bedding for cows.

"I see people going to the store, carrying their own grocery bags, returning plastic bags and putting out recyclables in special bins," he says. "And someday, they'll probably put their phone directories in those [curbside] collection bins."

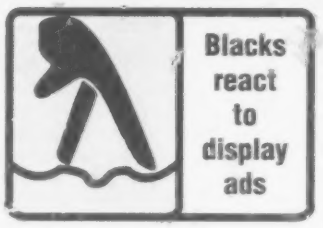
Ad Age/Gallup survey results

How blacks, affluent, Hispanics use books



Yellow Pages display ads have the biggest influence on what business consumers will call, but African-Americans are influenced by these ads more than any other group, an Advertising Age/Gallup Organization survey indicates.

Forty-one percent of blacks say display ads are the most influential factor in their decision-making, compared with 38% of the total sample.

Some 22% say they're influenced by companies whose names appear in bold type, compared with 17% of the total.

Another 8% of blacks say companies whose names begin with "A" and are listed at the beginning of the category get their attention first, compared with 3% of the total.

Fully 39% of the total sample said none of these reasons influenced their selection of a business, compared with only 27% of blacks.

An additional 2% of blacks said they didn't know whether these factors influenced them. □

Although all consumers use the Yellow Pages primarily for price information and comparison shopping, Hispanics use it for this reason more than any other group, an Advertising Age/Gallup Organization survey reveals.

A whopping 57% of Hispanics say they typically use the Yellow Pages for this purpose, compared with 40% of the total sample and 35% of blacks.

Another 26% say they use the Yellow Pages to find the closest business to their home or business, compared with 32% overall and 29% of blacks.

Only 6% say they use the Yellow Pages to find out store hours, compared with 10% overall and 18% of blacks.

Another 3% use the Yellow Pages for the maps, street guides and ZIP code information, compared with 6% overall.

Three percent say they use the Yellow Pages for any and all of those reasons, 3% say they use it for none of those reasons and another 3% say they don't know. □

When it comes to affluent, highly educated consumers, the bigger the Yellow Pages ad, the better they respond.

Forty-seven percent of college graduates and consumers whose incomes exceed $50,000 say display ads most influence their selection of a business, an exclusive Advertising Age/Gallup Organization poll shows. That compared with 38% of the total sample.

Companies whose names appear in bold type were ranked next most influential, with 14% of college graduates and 13% of those whose incomes exceed $50,000 choosing that option, compared with 17% of the total sample group.

Only 2% of college grads and 3% of the $50,000-plus group said companies whose names begin with "A" and are listed at the beginning of the heading are the most influential in selection of a business.

Thirty-six percent of the $50,000-plus income group and 35% of the college graduates said none of these is influential in their phone calls, while 1% and 2%, respectively, said they didn't know. □

FSI coupon redemption hits wall

By Scott Hume and Patricia Strnad

Couponing via free standing inserts may have hit its saturation point, industry observers say.

There were 218 billion coupons distributed via FSI last year, up 3.3% from 1989, said Kris Prasad, marketing research manager for CMS Inc., a redemption agent.

But only 2.3% of those coupons were redeemed, down from 2.9%. That indicates that FSI couponing may have reached a "saturation level," Mr. Prasad said.

The nation's other major coupon clearinghouse, Dun & Bradstreet Corp.'s NCH Promotional Services, said FSI coupons had a 2.2% redemption rate in 1990, down from 2.5%.

"The biggest issue is that you've simply got too damn many coupons," said Gary Blau, a partner in Computerized Marketing Technologies, a data-base marketing company that operates Select & Save, a targeted direct mail couponing program. "Consumers are inundated.

"You can come up with 14 different conclusions for why [FSI] redemption is down, but they're all going to come down to too much couponing going on."

Redemption rates both overall and for FSIs have been declining or stagnant in the past several years, largely because more coupons are being distributed. But 1990 marked the first time the FSI redemption rate was below the overall rate. The average redemption rate for all coupons in 1990 was flat at 2.6%, CMS reported.

One factor in the decline of FSI coupon redemption could be growth of direct mail as a coupon delivery medium. In 1990, direct mail accounted for 5.3% of all coupons distributed, up from 3.7%, CMS said. Redemption of direct mail coupons rose to 6.3% from 4.5%.

FSIs accounted for 80% of all coupons, about the same as a year earlier; coupons in newspaper run-of-press accounted for 5.6% of the total, down from 6.6%.

Mr. Prasad also pointed at a trend to using multiple coupons from a single marketer or from two or more marketers on a single insert page. That encourages consumers to pick and choose ones they want rather than using them all, he said.

Also contributing to the decline is a shortening of the period during which coupons are valid. Between 1987 and 1990, average coupon duration dropped to five months from 6.8 months, NCH found. While that helps limit marketer coupon liability and promotional costs, and provides quicker coupon promotion analysis, it works against redemption, NCH Senior VP Jane Perrin said.

But FSI companies argue there's still an important and cost-effective role for a mass medium in couponing.

"When you're hitting 51 million households on a single day [with an FSI], that's an incredible audience for a manufacturer," said Ken Bortner, president of News America's FSI division. The company owns Quad/Marketing and Product Movers, two of the largest distributors of FSIs through Sunday newspapers.

"When we talk to the top advertisers who work with us, we're hearing about increases. Numbers can be funny when you get into figuring averages," he said.

The increasing number of coupons "is always a concern of ours," Mr. Bortner said. "But we're looking at more creative ways to use FSIs. We have one coming up, a joint effort of a soft-drink and a cookie company, that doesn't have any coupon. It's strictly to announce a promotion and to tell consumers to look for the in-store display."

Other factors contributing to declining redemption include a move to fewer shopping trips and the shorter expiration dates, said a spokeswoman for Valassis Inserts.

Jeff McElnea, president of promotion agency Einson Freeman, Paramus, N.J., said FSIs without coupons will increase as inserts become "a print advertising tool every bit as much as a promotional tool. FSIs may be flattening out on coupons, and while they should include some added-value offer, that doesn't have to be a coupon.

"FSIs are not less effective if they're targeted properly. Readership remains very high." □

Marvel leaps into 900 promo

By Kate Fitzgerald

Marvel Entertainment Group this month unleashes Spider-Man in a test of the No. 1 comic book marketer's first 900 number promotion.

Spider-Man's "Help Me Save Mary Jane" line is a first for Marvel and for the 900 numbers industry, said Pamela Rutt, Marvel publicity director.

The promotion features an interactive audio game that awards prizes to callers playing the game via a Touch-Tone phone.

Calls cost $1.75 for the first minute, 95¢ for each minute after.

The line has several built-in safeguards. For example, calls are limited to four per week per household at a maximum of 3 minutes per call.

Callers hear a taped introduction to the game and then have 2 minutes to progress as far as they can in answering Spider-Man trivia and battling villains by using the phone keys.

"We've made it so no one can really overdo it and rack up high telephone bills," Ms. Rutt said.

AT&T, MCI Communications Corp. and US Sprint have safeguards built into their 900 number lines, including a $4 cap on each call for lines targeting kids.

Marvel built some safety nets into its Spider-Man promotion.

"The trend toward adding safeguards has increased, but limiting calls to four per week is relatively unusual," said Jan Rimmel, senior account executive at Phone Programs USA, which is executing Marvel's 900 number. "In general, the Spider-Man line has more limitations than most, because Marvel is very concerned about avoiding any kind of abuse."

The company hopes keeping costs low and preventing abuse will encourage repeat business and widespread interest in Marvel comic books, Ms. Rutt said.

The game encourages kids to call several times until the promotion ends in May by offering a tier of prizes. Players can advance from Level 1 to Level 4 and win more prizes.

Level 1 prizes include Marvel comic books and discount coupons for videogames from Sega of America, Taito Software and TSR. Ms. Rimmel said this is the first time marketers have been able to tie in to a 900 number promotion through coupons.

Marvel got 7,000 calls in the first five days, with calls averaging two minutes, said Jerry Calabrese, a consultant to Marvel.

The program may be extended to include other characters and story lines, but no decisions have been made.

Supporting the game is a page ad in all Marvel comic book titles through April; the ad was created in-house. Tarlow Advertising, New York, is Marvel's agency of record. □

Gannett plugs trial of 900 numbers

By Eric Weissenstein

Gannett Co. next month will promote its 900 numbers with outdoor advertising and 800 numbers.

Gannett offers six 900 numbers with 14 services, most in conjunction with USA Today. Information available includes stock quotes, sports news, weather reports, crossword puzzle clues and horse racing and lottery results.

Starting April 15, Gannett will promote two 800 numbers, one for USA Today and another for other Gannett newspapers. The 800 numbers let callers sample 900-number services for free. Calls to Gannett's 900 numbers cost 95¢ a minute.

"This is one of the few viable ways to get the information out there," said Blake Barker, exec VP, USA Today information center. "We believe that once people understand what our 1-900 services offer and the price, they will continue to call."

Gannett handles the effort in-house.

The 800 number for various Gannett papers will be customized for each market.

"For example, callers in El Paso [Texas] will get a message saying, 'You have reached the El Paso Times hot lines,' and they will be able to select from whatever options the Times chooses to offer," Mr. Barker said. "That way each paper can customize the service to their market."

This is the first time the phone services have been advertised outside Gannett's own newspapers, said Steven Anderson, manager of public relations at USA Today.

Despite the 900 number industry's growing pains, Gannett remains "totally committed" to using such services, Mr. Barker said. □

AD REVIEW

A fresh start, like Nescafe's new ads, is what works today

(Rating: ★ ★ ★)

By Bob Garfield

Garfield

The new Nescafe campaign is a triumph of cinematic storytelling and only incidentally about coffee, which once would have been considered an advertising blunder. But more on that presently.

First, a word from someone puzzled that your correspondent could loathe certain obnoxious ad characters while admiring the Energizer bunny—though most consumers polled seem to associate the bunny ads with archrival Duracell.

"Madge and Mr. Whipple were around for decades because they were selling Palmolive and Charmin by the ton," writes Victor G. Bloede, former chairman of Benton & Bowles. "I always thought that was the function of advertising: to sell products, not to entertain Mr. Garfield."

Well, Mr. Bloede, of course the function of advertising has always been to sell products. But here's what's happened since you retired: TV advertising had better also entertain Mr. Garfield, because Mr. Garfield has a remote control device and 120 cable options and a VCR. Thanks to 30 years of grating characters, insipid slices of life and phony hard sells, Mr. Garfield is impatient, and he will zap you before you can say "squeezably soft."

Madge and Whipple sold by the ton, yes, but they also polluted the airwaves, increasing consumer resistance and the cost of doing business for everyone. Your beloved toilet paper fondler was human sulfur dioxide.

Mr. Garfield will not allow himself to be poisoned any longer. He wants to be amused, moved, engaged, seduced. In a marketplace full of parity products, Mr. Garfield is wise to trumped-up selling propositions, but he's eager as ever to do business with people he likes. He doesn't want some sleazy salesman wedging his foot in the door, but he's prepared to regard advertising itself as a brand benefit. Energizer is a splendid example. Maybe a majority of consumers can't name the brand in a survey, but enough have recognized the pink bunny display at the checkout to halt Energizer's five-year market share slide.

Mr. Garfield is impressed.

For similar reasons, getting back to where this started, he is impressed with the new spots for Nestle Beverage Co.'s Nescafe from McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York—a sell so soft Mr. Whipple would want to squeeze it.

The premise is "a fresh start." This is what coffee gives you every morning, I suppose, but the conceit of this campaign is a parallel with a fresh start in life. One 60-second spot, called "Moving In," portrays a (presumably) divorced young woman moving into a wreck of a beach bungalow with her adolescent son. Another spot, "Cowboy," depicts a (presumably) widowed rancher preparing for his first date in years.

There's no copy, just a few notes of piano accompaniment to Peter Smillie's magnificently textured film, but as the rancher dismounts and walks into the house from the range, he is clearly anxious and reticent. He's also sweetly vulnerable for a 50-year-old chiseled out of Wyoming rock, and his angelic 11-year-old daughter, who is observing him, knows just what to do: a hot cup of Nescafe Classic, of course.

A widower rancher tries to get a fresh start, and so does Nescafe, in an emotional, decidedly soft-selling, new campaign from McCann-Erickson Worldwide.

Then . . . rabadabadamdam bambam boom . . . the plinking piano gives way to Fats Domino singing "I'm in Love Again." Amid the buoyant rock 'n' roll, the little girl looks adoringly at Daddy, Daddy's dressed and doing a jaunty number with his hat, and a fine-looking lady is about to meet a sensitive cowboy down to the Pine Room Cafe. Howdy ma'am.

"Nescafe," says the onscreen title. "Make a fresh start."

What's wrong with this campaign, written by Alison Stanich and art directed by Tom Upshur, is that the product is both too anonymous and too central. The notion of a cup of coffee liberating you from fear and depression is silly, but, just in case, which brand is it?

On the other hand, the stories are riveting, the acting and direction brilliantly understated and the "fresh start" metaphor positively established. There's no Mrs. Olson barging in and prattling about "Mountain grown" (vs. tundra-grown, I guess), but viewers won't zap these spots into oblivion. Over time the brand name is apt to reinsinuate itself, most favorably, in the consumer consciousness. And, good news, Mr. Bloede, it should sell by the ton to 24-to-59-year-old rural adults with shattered lives. □

Jobs' Next seeks West Coast shop

By Bradley Johnson

Next Computer, still struggling to make a go of it, will focus on the West Coast in its agency search.

"I'd personally like to work with someone local," said Karen Sipprell, Redwood City, Calif.-based Next's director of marketing communications and the top marketing executive under President-CEO Steven Jobs. However, the agency can be far away if it produces "awesome work," she said.

The Next agency should be prepared to offer advice on integrating other disciplines such as direct marketing and public relations with advertising, Ms. Sipprell said. Next's PR agency is Allison Thomas & Associates, Sherman Oaks.

"Dozens" of shops have approached the computer workstation marketer since Ammirati & Puris, New York, resigned earlier this month, she said.

Ammirati cited a conflict with client Nikon's electronic imaging technology. Some sources say Nikon was also concerned that rival Canon is a major Next investor.

Next spent only about $2 million on advertising last year. Spending will probably increase in the next 18 months, Ms. Sipprell said.

The account's prestige outweighs its billings: This is the second shot at greatness by Mr. Jobs, co-founder of Apple Computer.

But it's a long shot. Next has lost much of its luster since 1989, when it began shipping its sleek, black workstation with an introductory ad in The Wall Street Journal trumpeting Next as "the most successful computer start-up in history."

Only 2,250 workstations at $10,000 each were sold in 1989, estimated InfoCorp, a market research company. Last year, Next accounted for only about 10,000 of the estimated 430,316 workstations sold worldwide, reported WorkGroup Technologies, another research company.

Next has scrambled to regroup. In addition to redesigning its first machine and lowering the price, the company last fall introduced a $4,995 entry-level machine.

At the same time, Next aborted an exclusive distribution arrangement with Businessland after learning, to few critics' surprise, that a high-volume retail chain is ill-suited to sell a complex workstation line. Next is now building a direct sales force and also is talking with some selected computer retail outlets, according to trade reports.

Next has lost much of its luster since 1989. . . . "The window of opportunity has probably closed."

On the media front, Next last year moved most of its spending into computer publications after failing to generate sales volume with its launch ads in the business press.

Next has had three key endorsements this year. Lotus Development Corp., the top spreadsheet marketer, and WordPerfect Corp., the top word-processing software supplier, have begun shipping software for Next computers. IDG Communications, a major publisher of computer titles, has launched NeXTWORLD magazine.

With all these changes, Next could sell 21,000 computers this year, WorkGroup said.

But Next missed whatever technological advantage it had, said William Zachmann, president of Canopus Research, a market research company.

"The window of opportunity has probably closed," he said. "I think they're dead and they just don't know it." □ tion with Time Warner's Home Box Office cable channel.

Previews of Warner Bros. movies will be shown this season on park TV screens that entertain patrons as they wait in line for rides and attractions. The screens already show Warner cartoons.

Rides and attractions will also change.

Six Flags is planning a ride built around "Batman" for 1992, and another movie-themed attraction is expected to make its debut in 1993. It's also considering a stunt show based on Warner's "Police Academy" movies.

"But you will not see Six Flags become a movie studio," Mr. Cochran said. "We do not want to do this to every ride in the park. We want to do this when a character is hot."

The company will continue regional ad efforts for individual parks, some of which don't carry the Six Flags name. Those parks' current shops remain in place. □

New round for cola wars

The cola wars were re-ignited in February, with Pepsi-Cola moving into the No. 1 spot in Advertising Age's monthly survey of advertising awareness. Coke/Coca-Cola came in second, up from fourth place the previous month, and Ford was third. Diet Pepsi was mentioned by brand name for the first time in adWatch, giving it a ninth-place ranking in February. Advertising awareness was measured by a telephone survey of 1,000 adults who were asked to name the first advertising that came to mind from all advertising seen, heard or read in the past 30 days. Margin of error was plus or minus 3.1%.

Advertising Age's U.S. Agency of the Year:

Does liability shift weaken agencies' role?

By Jon Lafayette

The scramble to avoid getting stuck with bad debts is driving a wedge in the relationship between ad agencies, their clients and the media.

The American Association of Advertising Agencies earlier this month changed its policy that agencies be held "solely" liable for unpaid media bills to a "sequential" liability procedure.

The recommendation reverses a longstanding system of agency liability for the payment of media debts.

Agencies that adopt the new Four A's policy would be responsible for the payment of media contracts only after their clients have paid the agency.

Some media companies, particularly publishers, are up in arms over the move.

"I think it's a sign of weakness from the agencies, that maybe they don't have the kinds of relationships with the clients they say they have," said Thomas P. Losee Jr., publisher of Architectural Digest and VP at Knapp Communications Corp. "We keep hearing about partnerships. This flies in the Big Blue takes aim at Toshiba, Compaq

By Alan Radding

IBM Corp. tomorrow is expected to unveil its "notebook"-size portable computer along with a major advertising and marketing blitz to catch market leaders Toshiba America and Compaq Computer Corp.

IBM plans to break ads for its new computer March 27 in The New York Times and The Wall Street Journal. Spot and cable TV commercials will break April 1 on network morning news programs and such cable networks as Financial News Network and Arts & Entertainment. Ads in computer trade books break the week of April 8.

The success of this new product and the marketing blitz is crucial to the giant computer marketer, particularly after disappointing analysts last week by announcing sharply lower-than-expected revenues for the year, resulting in a stock price tumble.

The notebook—the fastest growing segment in personal computers—will fill a gaping hole in IBM's line of PCs, a segment it has never been able to dominate.

Big Blue is ready for a dogfight. Sales in the notebook segment (less than 8 pounds) are expected to grow to $4.7 billion in '95 from $800 million in 1990.

"The [notebook] computer market is going to be a major killing ground in the industry. Everybody is jumping in, but not everybody is going to be successful," said William Zachmann, president of Canopus Research.

"IBM is three years late with this product, so the question is

Reebok gives the boot to HHCC

STOUGHTON, Mass.—Reebok International dropped Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston, as its agency. As expected, Reebok divided creative responsibilities for the $70 million account between New York agencies Chiat/-Day/Mojo and Lois/GGK (AA, March 18). A spokesman for Hill Holliday, which had the account for almost a year, said, "We're pleased with the work we did. We wish them all the best." Chiat had the account before Hill Holliday and has continued to handle Reebok's international ads as well as domestic work for Weeboks toddlers shoes. Lois has been handling Reebok's Pump athletic shoes. DeWitt Media, New York, continues to handle media buying.

After 3 decades, author sounds words of warning for Madison Ave.

Thirty-three years after his "Madison Avenue, U.S.A." became a best seller and one of the most credible looks at the advertising business ever written, author Martin Mayer is back with another book about the advertising business, "Whatever Happened to Madison Avenue? Advertising in the '90s" (Little, Brown & Co., Boston; $22.45; June).

While Mr. Mayer remains steadfast in his belief that advertising builds brands by adding perceived value to products and services, and promotes choice, his new study left him feeling pessimistic.

Fragmenting national media, the rise of data-base marketing and the failure of ad agencies to nurture unique consumer research talents have put agencies in a bind, Mr. Mayer believes.

Advertising Age Editor Fred Danzig asked Mr. Mayer about some of his findings.

Advertising Age: What has changed in the agency business since the late '50s?

Mr. Mayer: Here's a story that I think symbolizes what's happening:

Back then, when I was working on another book [about the Ted Bates agency], I'd go in to see [Bates'] Rosser Reeves and we'd schmooze. He'd say, "You ought to see [Edward] Little [chairman of Colgate-Palmolive Co.]." And he'd get on the phone and say, "Mr. Little, I've got a guy here I think you'd be interested in meeting. He's writing something on the agency. What are you doing tomorrow?" And the next day I'd go and see Mr. Little. . . .

This time around, I'd see the ceos of the big agencies —$4 billion agencies, big operations, thousands of employees. And they'd say, you ought to see Lee Iacocca,

Gas cash discount fades

By Christy Fisher

Discounts for cash purchases of gasoline, a popular marketing tool of the 1980s, are being phased out by several oil companies.

Chevron Corp. and central U.S. Texaco stations have scrapped the discount given cash-paying customers over credit card users. And on July 1, Conoco Corp. will eliminate its credit card processing fee to encourage independently owned stores to offer the same price for cash or credit purchase.

Amoco Corp., Exxon Corp. and Mobil Oil Corp., however, still offer the discounts. No. 1 Shell Oil Co. has always had a same-price-cash-or-credit policy.

Chevron on March 4 announced in a national TV campaign via Young & Rubicam, San Francisco, that it would return to a same-price-cash-or-credit policy. It had done so in the West in mid-1990.

In response, Exxon broke print and radio ads in five markets—Dallas, Houston, Miami, New Orleans and Baton Rouge, La.—directly courting Chevron customers.

The print ad, from McCann-Erickson Worldwide, Houston, said, "Attention Chevron customers. Chevron no longer offers a cash discount. Exxon still does." The ad included a $1 coupon toward a purchase of 8 gallons or more of gasoline from Exxon. Direct mail coupons to Exxon credit card customers will be used through the end of April.

Chevron fought back with print ads in the same five markets saying, "Attention Exxon customers. Exxon charges you extra for credit. But at Chevron, credit is the same price as cash."

Under the new pricing, Chevron charge card customers will save about 2¢ or 3¢ a gallon, while cash customers will pay about 1¢ or 2¢ more, said Jim Gordon, director of sales for Chevron, noting that retail prices are set by individual station owners.

Company-owned stations in Texaco's central region decided to eliminate the discount Jan. 1 "in keeping with the company's desire to obtain 100% customer satisfaction," said Dan Stevens, manager of public and government affairs. About 450 stations in eight states are participating.

Industry analysts call the changes a move to appease credit card customers. Also, some cash customers found the discounts confusing when their discounts were being tallied at the cash register, not at the pump.

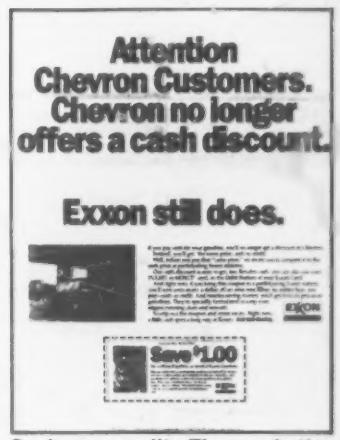
"Speaking as an oil industry analyst and a consumer, I prefer to use credit cards. . . . and I do resist the idea of paying a 4¢-to-5¢ premium to get credit," said William Randol, director of equity research, First Boston Corp. "If I go to Shell, where there is no difference, I feel better as long as the price is comparable to others' prices.

"What they might be trying to do is eliminate the differential between cash and credit and charge somewhere in between, if the competition will let them," he said.

Trilby Lundberg, publisher of the Lundberg Letter, an oil industry newsletter, said she doubts the change is a response to customer dissatisfaction, since the discount programs have been in place through much of the 1980s.

The cash discount programs were successful, she said.

About 86.5 billion gallons of gas were sold for the first nine months of 1990, according to Lundberg Survey, a market research company.



Cash vs. credit: The marketing scheme is highlighted in this Exxon newspaper ad.

No. 1 Shell had a 7.92% share, followed by Amoco with 7.48%; Exxon, 6.89%; Chevron, 6.61%; Mobil, 6.59%; and Texaco, 6.57%. □

GM sponsors military sports events

By Raymond Serafin

General Motors Corp. has signed on as the first title sponsor of the U.S. Armed Forces Sports Championships.

The collaboration is designed to bring wider exposure to the athletic events and new opportunities for GM to boost its visibility on military bases.

"While small in terms of spending, this deal probably has as much upside potential as anything I've seen in the last couple of years," said Philip Guarascio, executive director of advertising and marketing programs for the No. 1 automaker.

GM is providing $120,000 in cash plus an undisclosed amount of ad and promotional support.

Mr. Guarascio said GM will look at ways to put together a TV syndication package on broadcast stations or cable channels, especially in markets near military bases.

That could bring into play GM's estimated $60 million cross-media deal with Time Warner (AA, March 11). So far, only magazine buys are firmed up, but GM and Time Warner are looking at additional marketing opportunities using the media company's other resources.

GM is sponsoring the entire 19-event men's and women's athletic competition, held throughout the year at various bases with participation by members of the Army, Navy, Marines and Air Force.

GM tested the waters last year by sponsoring softball and golf. Prominent athletes who've participated as servicemen in the past include basketball's David Robinson and boxers Ken Norton and Leon Spinks.

P. Guarascio

While GM will hold title sponsorship and will be the largest corporate backer, several general and single-event sponsors will be announced as early as this week, said Robert Collins, VP of Umbrella Events Marketing, Carpinteria, Calif., which is helping to line up sponsors.

GM's contribution essentially involves buying ad time and space in media near bases where the competitions take place. GM will have product displays and product experts on hand at the events.

While the Persian Gulf War has heightened visibility of the military, Mr. Guarascio noted that GM's interest pre-dated the war and the company plans to be involved long-term.

GM regards military personnel as good car-buying prospects, especially for Chevrolet and Pontiac divisions, which attract large numbers of young buyers.

GM is also targeting the military market with a new program offering all active-duty personnel or their spouses, or any reservists called up during the Persian Gulf crisis, up to $800 off the purchase of a new vehicle. D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Bloomfield Hills, Mich., is handling advertising, mostly in military-edition newspapers and other media around bases. □

1. Great ideas aren't the answer.

Just as a good idea may stop you from going on to discover a great one, a great idea may stop you from going on to discover the right one. After you get a great idea, continue to look for the right idea.

2. Exact appropriateness.

Every product has a small group of words and pictures that are exactly appropriate to it. When the time is taken to discover them and weave them together expertly, recall goes way up and top-of-mind awareness in the category is preempted.

3. News, with style.

The excitement of a concept board or test commercial must come from the clear communication of news about the product. Style comes from clarity and precision, not cleverness that subordinates the news. Even when image is all important, it takes the form of news, not so much inherent in the product, but invented.

4. Efficiency in communication.

Maximum efficiency in mass communication is one word—a name that says everything. Second is a slogan that contains the name. After that, people have to remember two or more things to know your message. Efficiency goes down, and media expenditures lose impact.

Poll: Troop ads win support

By Scott Hume

A significant share of consumers say they will salute advertisers who salute the troops by buying their products.

AD AGE GALLUP SURVEY

According to an exclusive national survey conducted last month for Advertising Age by the Gallup Organization, nearly one-third (30%) of the 1,002 adults polled said they would be more likely to purchase a product from a company that ran ads expressing support for U.S. troops fighting in the Persian Gulf War.

A majority (58%) of those surveyed said such advertising would have no impact on their purchase decision, while only 8% said they would be less likely to buy from a company running ads expressing support for U.S. troops. The remaining 4% were unsure of the impact.

CYNTHIA WATSON

These numbers are significant because many advertisers have debated the use of advertising saluting the troops. Many feared if they did salute the troops, they would be considered opportunists and face consumer backlash. These figures show quite the opposite.

According to the Gallup survey, conducted during the first two weeks of February, most Americans don't view ads in support of the troops to be exploitive or inappropriate.

A wide majority of those surveyed, 78%, said they approve in general of a company using its ads to express support for U.S. military personnel. Fifteen percent expressed disapproval, 6% were unsure and 1% refused to answer.

The approval rating was higher among respondents with annual household incomes of $75,000 or more (86%) than among middle-income households (71%) or those with incomes of less than $20,000 (71%). It was also higher among consumers ages 18 to 34 (80%) than among those ages 35 to 54 (79%) or those 55 or older (73%).

The Gallup survey was conducted among a randomly selected but nationally projectable sample of 1,002 adults, interviewed by phone. The survey has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1%. □

SYNDICATION COMES OF AGE
The Revolution in Broadcast Television

As the daily headlines make clear,a revolution is going on in television. While it has been going on for some time, it has picked up momentum in the current season. It is forcing everyone associated with the industry — the programing suppliers (Network and Syndication), TV stations, and advertisers -to find new solutions to the problem of reaching the increasingly-elusive TV viewer.

The engine of change is channel proliferation, which has led to the fragmentation of the mass audience. The average household can now receive over 33 channels; this number is growing by 10% a year, and may soon multiply exponentially. This proliferation is having a tremendous impact on broadcast TV which, though no longer the only TV medium, is still by far the largest, accounting for 77% of all TV viewing.

One of the most important trends in the past decade has been the growth of Advertiser-supported Syndication into an important programming and advertising medium. Syndication has always been one of the two principal sources of programming for TV stations, Network television being the other. It is now reaching the point where, for TV stations as well as advertisers, the distinction between Network and Syndication is rapidly blurring - and may eventually disappear.

I. SYNDICATION: A DECADE OF GROWTH

Advertiser-supported Syndication has been one of the fastest-growing segments of television since the early 1980s, because it offers important advantages to the three key groups - TV producers, stations, and advertisers - who form the basis of free, over-the-air television.

- It has given TV producers, including top Hollywood studios, an important new market for original programming.
- It has given TV stations an affordable means of getting the original programming they need to stand out in an increasingly competitive environment.
- It has given national advertisers the most direct alternative to Network television in reaching the ever-more-elusive TV viewer.
- Finally, it has given the increasingly demanding TV viewer more programming choices. Some of the most popular shows on television are Syndicated shows.

Syndication's growing importance as a programming marketplace for producers can be seen in the growth of on-air first-run series — since virtually all first-run programming is advertiser-supported, in whole or in part. In the 1990/91 season there are 113 daily and weekly series on-air, up from only 45 in 1983. Over and above this are more than 300 movies and specials, many of them airing in Prime Time.

The importance of first-run Syndication to TV stations is evidenced by the fact that they are devoting a larger proportion of their airtime to these shows. While the number of series has been fairly stable for the past four years, more of them are daily (M-F) shows. Thus the number of hours-per-week of syndicated series on-air has continued to rise steadily, to 221 in the present season (see chart A, p. 5).

Syndication's 113 first-run series represent almost as many weekly on-air hours as the three networks and Fox combined:

	First-Run Syndication	Three Networks + Fox
Series	113	156
Hours/wk	221	243

Advertisers' growing appreciation of Syndication is evident in the growth of advertising revenues. Total industry revenues were $1.2 Billion in 1990, and are projected to hit $1.4 Billion this year — vs. barely $50 million in 1980. At a time when Network revenues have been steady, syndication ad revenues have averaged 16% annual growth over the past 4 years. (See Chart B)

And this growth is expected to continue: the Television Bureau of Advertising expects Syndication revenues to more than double by 1995, to $2.5 Billion.

Finally, the importance of Syndicated shows to viewers is attested by the most important fact of all: they watch them - in increasing numbers. Adults prefer Wheel of Fortune and Current Affair to the evening news; Donahue to Network game shows; Arsenio Hall to Rick Dees. Children cheer for the Ninja Turtles, Chip 'n Dale and Tiny Toons. Total Syndication audiences in the current season are ahead +3% while the three networks plus Fox are down a combined -5%.

THE ENGINES OF GROWTH

Syndication's growth is based on two trends which are expected to continue to benefit the industry in the hotly competitive 1990s: increasing penetration of network time periods, and changes in the cash/barter mix.

1. Penetration of Network Time Periods

Over the past several years, Syndication has expanded from its traditional base of Early Fringe and Prime Access [4-8pm], which are non-Network time periods, and encroached on the Networks in three areas:

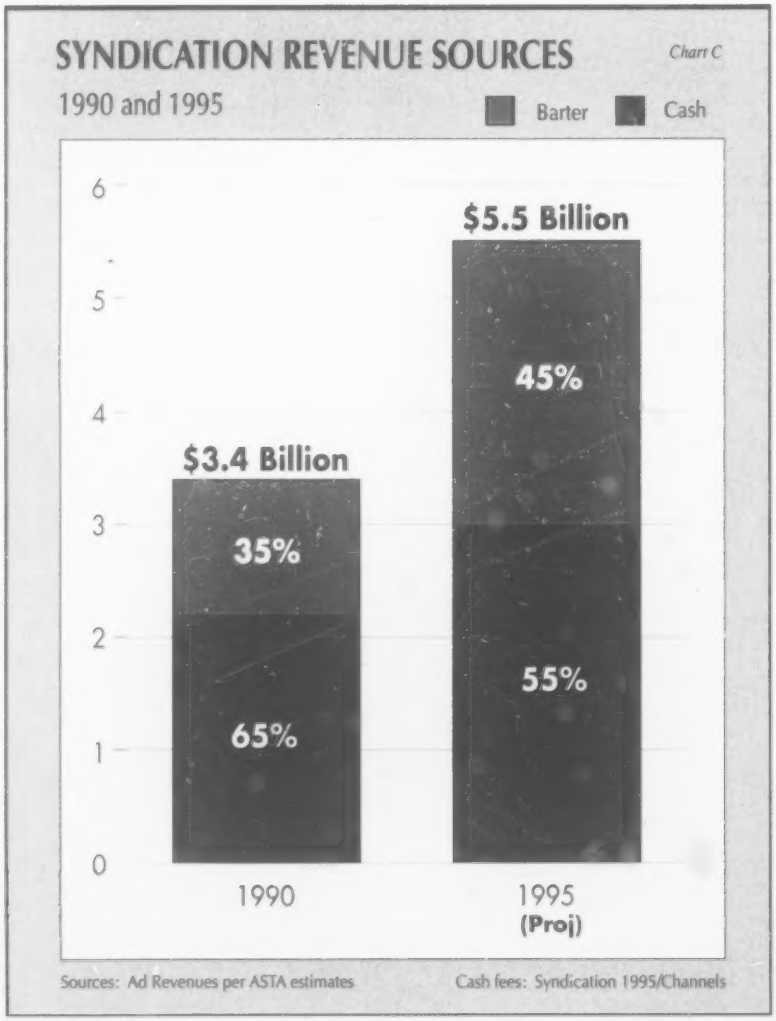
- In morning Daytime, shows such as Donahue, Sally Jessy Raphael, Joan Rivers, and Live with Regis & Kathie Lee have proved to be more attractive to viewers - and stations - than the programs offered by the Networks. All three Networks have major clearance problems in the 9-12 time period, averaging only 82% coverage for the time period. NBC's decision to turn back a full hour of this time to its affiliates starting in 1991/92 is essentially a recognition of its inability to compete with Syndication. Far from being a fluke, it is a harbinger of things to come.

- In Late Fringe, Syndication has attracted most of the available younger men. Only NBC is fully competitive in the time period. After some disastrous programming moves which have dropped its average coverage to 73%, CBS is waging a losing battle to keep its affiliates from pre-empting its new offerings for Syndicated shows. ABC, meanwhile, has long had problems finding an acceptable lead-out from Nightline - which is itself DB'd (delayed-broadcast) by almost half its affiliates in favor of Syndicated shows.
- In 1988, the three networks suffered setbacks when over 80% of affiliates in the Eastern and Western Time Zones moved to double access. In many cases they dropped their Network news back from the lucrative 7:00pm time slot to 6:30 in order to air two syndicated shows back-to-back.

As will be discussed below, the increasing tendency of network affiliates to pre-empt their network is one of the most profound changes going on today. The network/affiliate bond has been the source of the networks' strength for the past 40 years. The reasons why it is weakening lie at the heart of the changes going on in television today.
(See Section II.)



2. Changes in the Cash/Barter Mix

Advertiser-supported Syndication's growth is also due in part to a softening of the marketplace for Cash Syndication. At an estimated $2.2 Billion, (vs. $1.4B in ad revenues) cash license fees from stations still represent the largest part of Syndication. However, the cash marketplace is slowing due to continued softness in the National Spot marketplace.

This softness has left many stations cash-poor and inventory-rich. As a result, they are showing a marked preference for barter deals, in which they give up commercial time, over cash deals. Thus a number of new shows offered for the 1991/92 season are being offered on a full-barter, vs. a normal cash/barter, basis.

This preference for barter is extending into the market for off-network shows, which has traditionally been a cash-only marketplace.The offering of strong shows such as Roseanne, The Wonder Years and Married....With Children with barter time would have been unthinkable a few years ago. It reflects stations' desire to trade commercial time for lower license fees, and the sharing of ratings risk in partnership with syndicators.

Thus there will be a net expansion in the inventory of national barter time available over the next several years, both in terms of higher national/local splits, and in the introduction of barter time in shows that would normally have been cash-only. While this trend is somewhat dependent on the continued weakness in National Spot, ASTA predicts that barter's share of the total Syndication marketplace will increase from 35% to 45% as the marketplace grows to $5.5 Billion by 1995. (see chart C)

II. NETWORK AND SYNDICATION: THE CHANGING BALANCE

Just what is making Advertiser-supported Syndication so attractive to stations? Why are they preferring barter deals to cash? Why are Network affiliates pre-empting their networks in favor of Syndicated shows?

The main reason is, of course, programming: Syndication has developed some extremely popular shows. But there is an economic reason as well: TV stations are under extreme financial pressure; and at the same ratings level, a Syndicated show is more profitable for a station than a Network show.

To better understand why Syndication is growing, it's necessary to examine some of the basic structures of broadcast TV, starting with the most basic unit - the local TV station.

LOCAL TV: A UNIQUE SYSTEM

The television system in the U. S. is unique — not just in size and geographic scope, but in its structure. Unlike most countries, which have centralized (usually government-controlled) programming systems, the basic unit of U.S. television is the local TV station. There are over 1,100 commercial TV stations, in 210 separate television markets (ADIs), which vary greatly in size. Each of these stations is a private enterprise - not, as elsewhere, a conduit for government-controlled programming.

The business of each television station is to present the most attractive programming to the TV audiences it serves, competing against its rivals for the highest ratings in the market. It makes its money by selling commercial time in these programs, the price determined by its success in drawing audiences.

Virtually all (95%) of a TV station's revenue comes from the sale of commercial time, split about evenly between Local Spot (spending by local advertisers) and National Spot (spending by national advertisers in the local market). Network compensation accounts for only 4% of the average affiliate's revenues (see below).

Programming Sources

Since a station's revenues depend directly on the size of its audience, it follows that programming is the key determinant of success. The programs a station presents must be both popular (high ratings) and affordable. As we shall see, stations are having difficulty on both counts.

With the exception of local programming, which is typically limited to news on affiliates, stations have two sources of programing: Network and Syndication.

WHAT IS A NETWORK?

By definition, a network consists of a group of stations which agree to take programming from a programing service. While it can refer to the "ad hoc" network of stations which agree to take a Syndicated show, the term usually refers to the established networks - ABC, CBS, NBC and now Fox - who have established affiliation agreements with stations.

A station which has signed an affiliation agreement with one of the major networks receives from 11-1/2 to 13 hours of programming per day. This leaves it with only the 4-to-8pm time block to fill, typically with a mixture of local (and Network) news and Syndicated programs, 1-2 hours in the morning, and a varying amount of time after 11pm.

The station pays the network for the programming with a barter arrangement: typically it surrenders 90% of its commercial time in the show to the network for national sale, being allowed to run local advertising only in the adjacent time slots (at the hour and half-hour). In addition, the networks give back some of the proceeds from the national spots in the form of network compensation. However, this revenue source is small (only 4% of station revenues) and becoming increasingly insignificant as the networks seek to eliminate it.

For years, a network affiliation agreement was very valuable to a station because it significantly lowered a station's programming costs; and this is still true. Programming costs take only 12% of an affiliate's revenues, whereas an Independent station, which buys all its programming from Syndication, spends 36%. But changes are occurring on the other side of the ledger - revenues- which are squeezing the profitablity of all stations, and making Syndicated programmming more attractive.

The networks' stringent barter deal - taking 90% of a station's commercial time - only made sense for the stations so long as the ratings were high enough to make the few remaining local spots highly valuable. And competition - from Cable, from Fox, from Syndication, even vcrs - is eating into the networks' shares. Prime Time remains the networks' strongest area: but it is under attack. While some highly-visible hits continue to gain large audiences, the great majority of the Nets' Prime Time shows are very weak. Ratings in prime time have declined -13% since 1987; and as the chart above shows, 30% of the 3-Network Prime Time shows average a 10 rating or less. (see chart D)

This is serious for the networks, who have to make a decreasing number of hits pay for the remainder. They are resorting to a number of tactics to shore up their declining profits including:

- less expensive formats — reality shows, news, and "clip" shows - so-called "recycled TV".
- More reruns; reruns increased by 48% in 4th quarter 1990.
- Adding commercial units; up to 57 seconds more per hour in Daytime, according to one report.

All of this tends to diminish the value of the programming as long-term franchise builders. And this hits affiliates particularly hard, because it lowers the value of the few local spots they have to sell.

Affiliates (as well as Independents) are under other economic pressures, too. Many changed hands at high prices in the mid-1980s, and are laboring under higher debt loads (the average station's interest expense has more than doubled since 1986). Further, while National Spot has been growing, per-station revenues have lagged because there are more stations competing for it.

The result has been a severe decline in station profits - especially for affiliates; Independents have been helped by Fox, which has enabled them to raise their rates. Between 1986 and 1989 (latest data available), affiliate pre-tax profits plunged -30% on average, even as Indies became marginally profitable as a group. (see chart E)

Faced with this difficult financial picture, stations are turning to Advertiser-supported Syndication.

WHAT IS SYNDICATION?

Syndication refers to the sale of programs on a market-by-market basis to all 210 TV markets. Like the Networks, a Syndicator offers stations a programming service: the difference is that he offers it on a show-by-show basis. In contrast, the Networks sign stations to long-term deals in which the station agrees to take many shows.

Thus a station approaches each syndication deal on a case-by-case basis, evaluating the price, the quality of the program, the time period in which it will run, and the length of the contract to determine how profitable it will be. In times of severe financial pressure, it is a very sensible way to deal with programming. This is why stations are now often evaluating syndicated shows, not just in comparison with each other, but increasingly, with the shows currently offered by the Networks, as well. And increasingly, Syndication offers the station a better deal.

As noted previously, at a given ratings level, Syndicated shows are more profitable to stations than Network ones. In fact, Syndicated shows are becoming the most important profit center for many network affiliates. The reason: Syndicators give stations a better barter deal. Where the Networks will take 90% of the commercial time in a show, in Syndication the average for all-barter shows is typically 50%. This gives stations many more spots to sell.

The reason Syndicators are able to make a better deal is because they tend to be lower-cost producers. It is not that they are cheap: some of the top Hollywood studios are involved in Syndication, and they are willing to invest large sums in shows. Disney and Warner, for example, are said to be producing kids shows at a cost approaching $400,000 per half-hour - an all-time record.

What gives syndicators an advantage is lower overhead. They are not trying to service stations' entire broadcast day, making the successful shows pay for the losers. They keep their staffs low; and they are careful to budget show costs in line with projected revenues.

So Syndication is growing at the expense of Network television because it is in the stations' financial interest. Syndication is now dominant in Daytime, Early Fringe, Access, and is gaining in Late Fringe. It has taken a piece out of the weekday afternoon with Kids programming on Independents. If present trends persist, it will be only a matter of time before Syndicated series are running in Prime Time on many stations.

III. SYNDICATION AS AN ADVERTISING MEDIUM

We have seen why TV stations are airing more syndicated shows than ever. What about the group that provides the finances for all this original programming - the national advertiser?

National advertisers are buying Syndication because it is the most direct alternative to Network television in reaching the national TV audience.

Once, advertisers could place their ads on the three networks, secure in the knowledge that they would reach virtually all households in a short time. But competition has changed all that. Though the networks still account for a majority of viewing, their power to deliver mass audiences is dwindling rapidly.

As the mass audience becomes increasingly fragmented, advertisers must place their messages where audiences will find them. And as Syndication is drawing larger and larger audiences, advertisers are using more of it.

As shown in chart F (p 17) makes clear, a significant portion of the TV audience isn't watching Network TV. Even in Prime Time, less than 60% of the TV audience is tuned to the three majors. Their other area of strength is the afternoon soaps (56% share). In other dayparts, they have a much lower share of the total audience --either because their programming is not sufficiently attractive, or because, as in Early Fringe and Prime Access, they don't offer programming.

Cable accounts for some non-Network viewing throughout the broadcast day. But Cable's low ratings and coverage - especially in top-20 markets - means that it can only be a partial solution to the fragmentation problem.

More than 75% of all TV viewing is still to broadcast TV; and Syndication is the only national broadcast alternative to Network television.

SYNDICATION'S MEDIA BENEFITS

The specific advantages of Syndication to advertisers may be summarized as follows:

1. Large (and increasing) total audience.
2. High ratings
3. National coverage
4. Broad reach
5. Reach vs. special target audiences
6. Efficient delivery

1. Large Audiences

As shown in chart G (p23), in the 1989/90 season Syndication delivered over 28% of the national broadcast audience, vs. an average of 23% for the three major networks. This share will increase in the current season, as the networks are experiencing further audience erosion (-5% in 4th Quarter), while Syndication is up +3%.

2. High Ratings

In daypart after daypart, some of the highest-rated shows are Syndicated shows. As noted in Section I, Syndicated shows are displacing Network shows in Daytime and Late Fringe, and are outperforming the Network news. Wheel of Fortune draws a bigger audience than 70% of the three Networks' Prime Time shows - and does it five nights a week. Syndication personalities such as Phil Donahue, Oprah Winfrey and Arsenio Hall have become cultural icons. And in Prime Time, Syndication offers high-rated Movies and Specials.

3. National Coverage

Syndication is a fully national medium. The average coverage is 83% of U.S. households, while top shows deliver in the high 90s. In Daytime and Late Fringe, many Syndicated shows have higher coverage than the Networks.

4. Broad Reach

Thanks to its large audiences, high ratings and broad coverage, Syndication is an excellent reach vehicle. With the publication in mid-1990 of the offical Nielsen Cume study (which covers Network, Syndication, Cable and Spot), advertisers can fully appreciate Syndication's reach capabilities. ASTA's own Cume study, published in 1989, showed that Syndication builds (see chart H on p 29) audiences in much the same way that Network does, reaching over 90% of U.S. homes. Since then, Syndication has grown as Network ratings have declined, further reducing the difference between them.

The ASTA Cume study also showed that advertisers could improve their reach by mixing Network and Syndication. Reach was maximized across several dayparts when Syndication accounted for 25% of total weight -consistent with its share of audience.

5. Reach vs. Special Target Audiences

One of Syndication's biggest advantages is its ability to reach special target audiences which are not well served by the Networks including Kids and Teens, younger men, and Working Women.

a. Kids and Teens

As shown below, syndication has given advertisers the ability to reach Kids during the week with some of the most popular (and expensive) animated shows ever produced. Powered by shows such as Disney's Chip 'n Dale and DuckTales,

Warner's Tiny Toons and the ever-popular Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles. Syndication delivers 69% more Kids than the Networks (including Fox) and 58% more Teens. (see chart I, p35)

b. Younger Men and Teens

Syndication has captured the younger-male audience with hip talk shows and science fiction. And music shows such as America's Top Ten, Soul Train, Pump it Up! and the MTV Video Music Awards do well among both younger adults and Teens

c. Working Women

As more women have gone to work over the past two decades, it has become harder for advertisers to reach them. Syndication can help: twice as many Working Women watch Early Fringe and Access (4-8pm) shows as watch the afternoon soaps. And the highest concentration of Working Women (20% of the audience) is found in Late Fringe, another Syndication stronghold.

6. Efficient Delivery

Syndication has always been an efficient alternative to Network television. Further, Syndicators generally offer guaranteed audience delivery on a scatter as well as an upfront basis. Syndicators' service-based approach to selling was particularly evident in the 1990 upfront season, when they opted to stay with traditional audience guarantees despite volatile shifts in the Nielsen ratings.

IV. CONCLUSION: THE BROADCAST REVOLUTION

Competition is transforming television, and forcing a change in traditional ways of doing business. More change, in the form of new technologies, changed regulations, and different economic conditions, are on the way. In this volatile environment, Advertiser-supported Syndication is well positioned to grow and prosper. It is a system which produces programs which stations can afford, viewers want to watch, and advertisers want to buy. Having arisen in the face of stern competition, it is well adapted to meet the challenges of the 1990s.

WPP Group, led by mega-agency subsidiaries Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide and J. Walter Thompson Co., far outdistanced a trimmed-down Saatchi & Saatchi Co. in 1990 as the world's biggest advertising organization, according to Advertising Age's 47th annual Advertising Agency Report.

WPP pushed its gross income to $2.7 billion, well beyond Saatchi & Saatchi's $1.7 billion, a tally minus a consulting division that produced more than $700 million in 1989.

Apart from these London-based international behemoths, Leo Burnett Co. topped all U.S.-based "brand" agencies with gross income of $299.3 million to turn back a challenge from Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide with $270.7 million. A "brand" agency is the core agency stripped of its subsidiaries (see story on Page S-4).

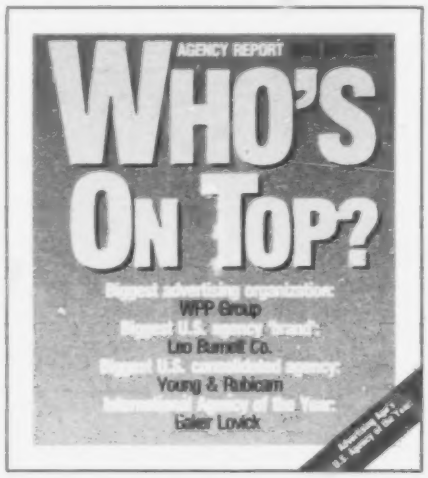
Foote, Cone & Belding Communications finished No. 3 among the branded shops, followed by No. 4 Grey Advertising, No. 5 J. Walter Thompson Co., No. 6 Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide, No. 7 Young & Rubicam, No. 8 McCann-Erickson Worldwide, No. 9 BBDO Worldwide and No. 10 D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles (see chart, Page S-12).

Dentsu Inc., Japan's largest agency, continued to be the dominant agency outside the U.S. with gross income of $1.25 billion, well ahead of Paris-based Eurocom Group at $748.5 million. Dentsu actually suffered a slight decline due to a slowdown in advertising and a 7.1% decline in the Japanese yen against the U.S. dollar.

However, a decline in the dollar against stronger European currencies helped push the international contribution in gross income of the Ad Age Top 500 U.S. agencies to $5.25 billion, up 18.5%, on billings of $36.01 billion.

U.S. activity by these same 500 agencies rose to $7.44 billion in gross income, up 6.4%, on billings of $53.96 billion. Worldwide, gross income advanced to $12.69 billion, up 11.1%, on billings of $89.97 billion.

The lower U.S. growth rate took its toll on agency jobs. The number of U.S. employees with the Top 500 grew only 1.5%, to 73,045. The employee level abroad for these agencies grew to 66,480, up 7.5%, placing worldwide employment at 139,525, up 4.3%.



These percentages were even more dramatic among the Top 100, where virtually all foreign billings of U.S. agencies are generated. In this group, U.S. employment increased just 0.3% to 54,784 and non-U.S. employment advanced 7.5% to 66,480 for a worldwide increase of 4.1% to 121,264.

The international segment of the report, which ranks 1,031 foreign agencies in 76 countries, was led by Japan with billings of $24.17 billion, down 0.5%, followed by Britain at $11.5 billion, up 18.6%; France at $10 billion, up 33%; Germany at $5.8 billion, up 26%; and Italy at $4.6 billion, up 21%. Growth in European billings was enhanced by a 5.7% rise in the value of the pound, 15.3% growth in the mark and 13.7% improvement in the lira.

Non-U.S. growth in the agency business also sustained the huge U.S.-based consolidated agencies, a group led by Young & Rubicam with $1 billion in gross income, $550.8 million of that coming from outside the U.S.

The composition of agencies on the consolidated chart, AA's traditional chart for ranking agencies, differs from that of the Top 50 advertising organizations in that individual segments of these advertising organizations are ranked as consolidated agencies.

Interpublic Group of Cos., No. 3 on the Top 50 chart, for example, isn't ranked on the consolidated chart; its U.S.-based agencies, McCann-Erickson Worldwide and Lintas:Worldwide, are ranked instead (see chart on Page S-6).

Y&R passed McCann-Erickson Worldwide, the perennial leader in foreign gross income among U.S. shops. McCann had foreign gross income of $534.6 million. Y&R also led all U.S.-based consolidated agencies in U.S. gross income with $450.6 million.

The U.S. Top 500 handle most of the U.S. network and spot TV spending. Network TV, which claimed the largest media volume among the Top 500 U.S. brand agencies, helped plant Leo Burnett Co. firmly atop the brand chart by accounting for 43.9% of its media billings, or $894 million. Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide, No. 2 to Burnett in the agency brand race, finished second in network TV billings with $858.2 million, up 6.8%.

Network TV accounted for 30.2% of total billings broken out by the Top 500, down from 31.1% in 1989. The medium, however, grew 5.2% from 1989 to $10.2 billion.

Saatchi was the leading spender in spot TV at $584.3 million. Chiat/Day/Mojo was No. 2 at $497.3 million. Spot TV claimed 25.1% of overall media billings of the 500, up from 24.6% of the total in 1989. Spot grew 10.5% to $8.49 billion.

Consumer magazine spending, the third-largest media category, dropped as a per-

AA seeks 'creative breakthrough,' but no shop makes grade in '90

By Fred Danzig

The search for Advertising Age's U.S. Agency of the Year has come up empty-handed.

For the first time since Ad Age began bestowing "best agency" honors in 1973, the procedure ended with a decision to pass.

Editors and staff, basing their choices entirely on evaluations of creative work, were unable to work up sufficient "best agency" enthusiasm for any one of the shops that landed in the 1990 finals.

The Ad Age balloting focuses on creative work rather than agency size, longevity, new business or profitability and growth, so all agencies, theoretically, become eligible for consideration.

Last year, when San Francisco-based Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein was named Agency of the Year for 1989, it was because its work, like that of the 16 agencies previously honored, was marked by a consistent freshness and flair.

Also, the Ad Age staff saw an abundance of "breakthrough" qualities in the agency's print and broadcast portfolio. Goodby's creative palette, imbued with wit, understanding and warmth, respected the consumer as well as the client's product or service.

This time around, the judges saw high levels of professionalism, warmth, excellent graphics and sound copywriting, casting, acting, production values and creative craftsmanship. But in the final analysis, no one contender established a clear superiority or produced a dominant "creative breakthrough" for all to gawk at and admire. No "Energizer bunny" idea.

While it's not always essential for agencies to create "breakthroughs" to win Agency of the Year honors, the search is geared to spotting seminal work that can change the advertising landscape—work that leaves excitement in its wake and gives promise of establishing advertising's equivalent of a "new world order," if you will. This didn't happen in 1990.

The work of the finalist agencies, good as they are, was deemed to be not quite as good as, let alone better than, the work they or others had shown in previous years. While there was a goodly amount of clever recycling around, conceptual innovations were in short supply. Some new sparks flashed in already popular continuing campaigns, but it was felt that exceptional, exciting work was missing.

Additionally, it was felt that some of the best TV work of the year had a relatively short shelf life, a faster "wear-out" quotient.

That being the case, the editors felt if they proceeded to name a 1990 Agency of the Year, it would only serve the cause of providing continuity to the Ad Age list of winners, not advancing the cause of rewarding clearly superior creative work.

The judges saw high levels of professionalism. But in the final analysis, no one contender established a clear superiority or produced a dominant "creative breakthrough."

During the judging period, as agency executives were asked discreetly for their thoughts on 1990 creative work, a whole lot of head scratching went on. They thought about it, promised to get back to us and finally had to concede it wasn't a vintage year.

We argued whether agencies should get extra credit for maintaining a certain level of creative excellence in their continuing campaigns; we decided they should. But then we asked whether this knack should be enough to win our "best agency" prize. The answer: No.

Many a blank space or "no winner" has appeared in the past on advertising competition lists to note that the work in the category wasn't quite good enough. Ad Age, as serious about its awards as any other institution, has reserved the same right to vote "no winner."

For the record, the agencies that made it to the finals, in alphabetical order, were BBDO Worldwide, New York; Bozell, New York; W.B. Doner & Co., Southfield, Mich.; and Eisaman, Johns & Laws, Chicago.

While identifying finalists in a competition that produced no winners might seem to do those agencies no favor, they did make the top of the list in advertising's 1990 body of work, and so they all can derive a measure of pride, glory—and encouragement—on that basis.

As the "no winner" option was debated, the idea gained force and then widened into an attempt to explain what had led to the tail-off in creative work last year.

Why had the general level of agency creative work fallen short of expectations?

The answers came tumbling forth but are summed up by one word: distractions.

The recession, a relatively recent fact of life to the general public and economists, has been nibbling at the advertising business for more than a year. Belt tightening, however, has been going on in the agency business for years, and the constrictions apparently caught up with agencies last year.

Agencies were distracted as clients,

International Agency of the Year

Baker Lovick ads: clear, crisp creative

Canadian agency a unit of BBDO

By Carolyn Lesh

TORONTO—This winter, Baker Lovick took the unusual step of creating a page newspaper ad with almost nothing in it—nothing but outlined, pictureless spaces containing descriptions of five Black & Decker Canada products.

The ad explained that the tools and small appliances were unavailable because of a sellout just weeks after a demonstration TV campaign was launched.

Baker Lovick's TV spots focused on clear consumer benefits and were beautifully shot, highly creative and, like all the agency's work these days, marked by a conceptual freshness.

This ability helped the Canadian agency earn the title of Advertising Age International Agency of the Year for 1990.

The BBDO Worldwide unit outshone 62 other agencies from 26 countries to become the seventh agency to win the award. Runners-up were BDDP in France and Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising in New Zealand.

"I've always wanted Baker Lovick to be more than just Canada's best agency," said Boris Damast, exec VP-national creative director. "Our agenda has been international."

Mr. Damast, an Australian, joined the agency three years ago as the first major hire of President-CEO Peter Mills, another Australian, who joined the agency in 1986.

Mr. Mills said one of his first goals was to make the agency more "fashionable" by improving creative. His efforts paid off. Baker Lovick claims it won more awards in 1990 than any other agency in Canada, picking up 22 gold medals at competitions in the U.S., U.K. and Canada.

Baker Lovick posted about $144 million in billings during 1990 from clients including Apple Canada, Chrysler Canada, Gillette Canada, John Deere Ltd., Lever Bros., Polaroid Canada and Wrigley Canada. It's the No. 10 agency in the country, with 248 employees in six offices.

But size hasn't stifled Baker Lovick's creativity, as the Black & Decker spots show. The commercials, written by Mr. Damast, are short on words and long on product demonstration.

One, for the Power Pro Dustbuster, features the product sucking up a coffee filter and the coffee grounds beneath it, a raw egg and an entire glass of a soft drink. There are only seven spoken words: "Power Pro. The most powerful Dustbuster yet."

Mr. Damast used only 10 spoken words to sell Black & Decker's Heat 'N Stick glue gun. His objective was to dramatically show how the product could work with a variety of materials.

In the commercial, a ladder is built with rungs of wood, leather, metal, plastic and ceramic. The rungs aren't inserted into holes, but are attached directly to the lad-

Clever print for Black & Decker proves Baker Lovick's creative focus and clarity.

"That shot," inspired from old Western movies, dramatically displays Chrysler's entire line.

Industry shifts force re-evaluation

It's time for a fresh approach to evaluating the advertising agency business.

Changes in agency ownership structure and competitive patterns have forced the editors of Advertising Age to radically shift the way we rank the top 500 U.S. agencies. Rather than list shops by how their income stacks up when their myriad subsidiaries are folded in, we've pulled out the core agencies and left them to stand on their own.

The move makes the ranking more equitable. It refines the ranking of U.S. shops so that no ranked subsidiary's totals are included in its parent's figures.

For example, unlike in last year's main U.S. ranking, AC&R Advertising is not included in Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide's returns.

We also have expanded the annual rankings to include the World's Top 50 advertising organizations.

This listing (see Page S-8) ranks agencies with agency holding companies or groups. The chart monitors the structural evolution that is blurring the distinction between agencies and holding companies.

The general rule has been that an agency is an operating company, and a holding company isn't. The former makes ads; the latter doesn't. The emerging European and U.S. configurations indicate the difference may be in name only apart from any legal or tax reasons.

For example, FCAB Group and BDDP Worldwide in Paris are both agency and holding company, as are Ketchum Communications and Ross Roy Group. Leo Burnett Co., an operating company in the U.S., has an international holding company for its foreign units.

Combined, the two charts—Top 500 U.S. agency brands and the World's Top 50 advertising organizations—also provide a more complete assessment of agency competitiveness at both the micro and macro levels.

By ranking holding companies and not their mega-agencies, the new chart format avoids the often arbitrary manner in which holding companies divided their units for a consolidated agency ranking.

This practice of subdividing holding companies runs counter to the new holding company structure, in which they unbundle subsidiaries from the main-agency to broaden their potential client base. When this occurs, subsidiaries can compete directly for new business against their former parent.

Ad Age has accommodated this practice of subdividing to maintain continuity in figures from year-to-year, but this methodology was criticized because it enabled two competitive agencies to combine for a higher ranking.

Holding companies also have continued to buy agencies, creating a problem of how to consolidate totals of the new subsidiaries. This raised the recurrent question of whether a new acquisition should be a separate entity or part of an existing mega-agency within the holding company.

When a merger occurred between two subsidiary units of two mega-agencies under a common holding company, the issue became which mega-agency, if any, should take credit for these merged financial results.

Also, some holding companies seeking to boost their gross income and billings have tried to "manufacture" agency numbers. Citing a switch in reporting structures, they would move an agency from one mega-agency group to another. This "trump" card agency would artificially inflate results, possibly enough to leapfrog a competitor on the list.

While the advertising organi-

Which is the biggest agency depends on how you define the term.

This year Ad Age has ranked the U.S. agency business the way clients do: On a brand-name basis. The ranking of the 500 top agencies now represents the core agency. Pared from this ranking are subsidiaries who may battle the core agency for account business but then be folded into the core shop to inflate its rank.

Those siblings are added back into the ranking of consolidated agencies on S-6. But as holding companies proliferate, to judge the business by those guidelines seems a less accurate way to reflect the state of the agency business.

centage of the Top 500's media total, from 14.8% in 1989 to 14.4% in 1990 even though the medium grew 4.7% to $4.86 billion. That figure represents about 70% of all consumer magazine spending.

Saatchi & Saatchi spent the most in the medium at $275.2 million, down 11.2%, while Y&R was No. 2 at $238 million, up 4.4%. Four of the top 10 spenders in consumer magazines billed less in 1990 than in 1989.

Newspapers represented 8.3% of the Top 500's media total, down from 9.1% in 1989. The category volume declined by 1.5% to $2.81 billion. Leading spender was Bernard Hodes Group at $147.7 million, up 6.4%. Y&R finished second at $115.1 million, up 1.9%. Five of the top 10 agencies in newspaper ad volume spent less in 1990 than in 1989, with JWT recording the most precipitous drop at 41.8% to $83.6 million.

The two hot broadcast mediums—cable and syndicated TV—continue to draw strong support from the Top 500. Cable grew by 41% to $1.02 billion paced by $125.2 million from D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, agency for the nation's leading cable advertiser, Anheuser-Busch Cos. D'Arcy spending leaped 174% in the medium. DDB Needham Worldwide finished second at $89.1 million, a 57.6% growth.

Syndicated TV showed a dramatic 36.2% gain to $599.7 million. Burnett outspent all agencies with $138.5 million, up 6.1%. D'Arcy was second at $96.9 million, up 21%.

D'Arcy led the Top 500 in spot radio buying with $157.1 million, up 56.6%. Spot radio gained 4% to $2.21 billion among the Top 500. Second-largest spender in the medium was DDB Needham at $102.8 million, down 17.7%.

In Yellow Pages, specialist agency Telephone Marketing Programs dominated all spending at $351.7 million, up 39.5%. D'Arcy was a distant second at $100.7 million. Yellow Pages got a healthy 25.3% increase in billings to $866.2 million.

Burnett paced outdoor spenders with $127.1 million in billings, up 0.6%, and well ahead of second-place finisher Ally & Gargano at $59.5 million, up 112.5%. The Top 500 spent $729.6 million in outdoor, up 11.5%.

Campbell-Mithun-Esty spent $88 million to lead spenders in network radio, which drew billings of $487.4 million from the Top 500.

New York City continued to dominate ad spending among the Top 500 U.S. brand agencies, claiming 45.8% of total U.S. billings, or $24.73 billion, compared with 46% in 1989. Ad growth in the city rose a collective 7.5% among the 174 shops reporting. New York's biggest agency office in billings was Grey Advertising at $1.47 billion.

Chicago finished No. 2 at $6.87 billion, up 5.3% with 72 shops reporting. Burnett paced all city shops with billings of $2.04 billion, the largest tally credited to a single office among U.S. agencies.

Los Angeles came in No. 3 at $4.32 billion, up 8.4% based on 55 agencies reporting. Chiat/Day/-Mojo in nearby Venice led the pack with $384 million.

Detroit, whose auto-dominated billings grew 5.1% to $3.6 billion, ranked No. 4, with JWT's local office billing $462 million as the top shop.

San Francisco finished No. 5 at $1.92 billion, a remarkable 32.8% growth. FCB led the 30 reporting shops with an estimated $340.3 million in billings.

Tokyo fell just short of New York in laying claim to the title of world advertising capital. Tokyo billings were $22.2 billion, just over 91% of the total reported by 40 Japanese agencies. Tokyo is home to 12 of the World's Top 50 advertising organizations, the most of any city. New York is second with 11. London and Paris each have five.

Tokyo was paced by the indomitable Dentsu, with a massive $8.91 billion in billings credited to its Tokyo headquarters.

London was credited with virtually all of Britain's $11.5 billion in billings, where Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising dominated with $1.25 billion in billings.

Agencies located in Paris and environs amassed virtually all France's billings of $10 billion. RSCG France in the Paris suburb of Issy les Moulineaux barely turned back Publicis Conseil, the perennial leader in French advertising billings, with $1.2 billion in billings, compared with $1.16 billion from Publicis.

However, an analysis of billings by U.S. and foreign cities is not comparable because U.S. totals are billings actually generated by shops in local markets, regardless of where the parent agency is headquartered.

Japanese, French and British billings were credited to the headquarters city of the parent, because billings by offices were not available.

There is little doubt, however, that the advertising business is dominated by the national capitals in these countries. □

Why Lopex, Aegis were left out

Lopex Group and Aegis Group, two London-based holding companies heavily involved in advertising, have been excluded from the World's Top 50 rankings by Ad Age.

Lopex was omitted because its sole advertising returns, based on its large stake in Alliance International Advertising Group, are included with Alliance figures. Ad Age seeks to clear "double-dipping" from its charts.

Lopex is considered the investment vehicle that brought agencies together into the Alliance network. It holds various percentages of Alliance network agencies that would equal 50.2% of Alliance's total returns if treated on an equity basis.

Ranking Alliance as the sum of its parts was difficult enough. Alliance is a holding company that independent agencies around the globe invest in, receiving in return the right to carry the Alliance logo and a greater international presence. Alliance doesn't own, per se, its network agencies. The network agencies and Lopex own Alliance.

Alliance management is composed of the agency managers plus two Lopex people. The board forms an executive which decides on network issues such as the amount of central fees paid annually by agencies, regional or central staffing, new business policy, inter-agency agreements, training, etc.

Aegis falls short of the list because the bulk of its business is media buying, not advertising. Aegis is the successor to what used to be called WCRS Group.

Carat, Europe's largest media-buying company, is its primary operation. Other holdings include 40% equity each in Della Femina, McNamee, New York; Wight Collins Rutherford Scott, London; and Ball Partnership in Asia and Australia. (Eurocom owns the remaining 60% of each.)

These holdings gave Aegis gross income of $330 million on billings of $5.8 billion in 1990. Carat itself generated gross income of $265 million on billings of $5.3 billion. □

Re-evaluation

zation chart may seem to be mixing agencies and holding companies, it essentially is mixing common elements. Agency holding companies have few operations that agencies lack.

Entries on the chart include only the equity held in subsidiaries, whether U.S. or foreign. In a number of cases Ad Age editors recalculated submissions to ensure all advertising organizations met this reporting requirement.

In several cases, minority-held subsidiaries are ranked on the World's Top 50 chart along with the advertising organization that holds a minority interest in those shops.

For example, No. 28 Wells, Rich, Greene is 40% owned by No. 15 BDDP Group. Yet WRG is ranked at its full volume in the World's Top 50 because it holds a majority stake in itself.

Profiles of the companies—presented in alphabetical order beginning on Page S-20—identify the few cases where "double-dipping" persists.

Top 500 U.S. agency 'brands'

In this report, Ad Age is expanding its coverage of U.S. agency "brands" to all U.S. agencies from the Top 50 U.S. agencies in 1989. This ranking by U.S.-only gross income (Pages S-12 through S-17) unbundles subsidiaries from parent totals to allow both to appear on the charts separately without duplication.

A "brand" agency has an identity separate from its subsidiaries. The process of arriving at a "brand" figure generally reduces the company to its core agency by stripping away layers of general agency subsidiaries or specialized services. A list of exclusions is shown on Page S-17.

The "brand" agency concept is controversial among multi-tiered agencies that are trying to become "seamless" even though separate identities may be maintained by some of their units.

Top consolidated U.S. shops

Over the years, the top U.S.-based agencies ranked by consolidated worldwide gross income has been the standard measurement of an agency's size.

This ranking (see chart) differs from the Top 50 advertising organizations because it dissects the two-and-or-three-tiered advertising organizations found in the Top 50 into mega-agencies.

This chart appears in this report for the sake of continuity. Ad Age believes the charts defining the Top 50 advertising organizations and the U.S. "brand" agencies should supersede it.

Media category rankings

Rankings by 14 media categories (see Page S-31) are based on the agency "brand" media totals. Media breakouts were provided by the agencies.

Exchange rates

Agencies converted local currency to dollars using average annual exchange rates compiled by Ad Age. The exchange rates for 1990 and 1989 and their percentage growth are shown for each country at the beginning of the country's rankings which start on Page S-22. Ad Age maintains separate rates for both reporting years. □

Notes: Dollars are in thousands. ✓ indicates that the agency received signature of an independent accountant verifying figures supplied to AA. * indicates that gross income figures are AA estimates. 1989 rankings are computed from figures reported in 1990. See below for methodology.

U.S. agency brand methodology

The 558 U.S.-based agency brands ranked on the preceding pages do NOT include the gross income or billings from other agencies reporting to AA for this report. Billings attributed to public relations fees have been subtracted wherever possible. Some agencies report figures to AA that include the results of subsidiary agencies that also report to AA. Subsidiary agencies' figures were excluded as follows:

Notes: Dollars are in millions. Alliance is a 27-member agency holding company owned by its agencies and Lopex PLC, a U.K. holding company that also includes large investments in communications and marketing services companies. In turn, Lopex holds equity in many of the individual Alliance shops, including 100% of Alliance International U.K., the largest Alliance shop, and 41% of Warwick Baker & Fiore Alliance, New York. These various holdings give Lopex $475.2 million in billings. See story Page S-4.

Notes: Dollars are in millions. Full-year returns representing BDDP's 40% holding in Wells, Rich, Greene were included in both 1989 and 1990 returns for BDDP, which bought into WRG in April 1990. Without WRG included in 1989 numbers, BDDP registered a 108% growth in gross income in 1990 over the prior year. Figures for WRG, BDDP's sole U.S. holding, do not include returns for Wells' Gardner Advertising, St. Louis, which folded during 1989. BDDP is both a holding company and agency. BDDP organization totals comprising its ranking are a composite of its equity in gross income and billings in each agency listed in the profile.

Notes: Dollars are in millions. Early this year Dentsu bought a 30% holding in CDP Europe after Dentsu lost its European connection in December 1990, when HDM Worldwide was split up between its three partners. HDM Europe went to Eurocom. The U.S., Australian and Asian operations went to Dentsu and Young & Rubicam. Dentsu did not claim this equity in its 1990 results. CDP holds no equity in half its network shops, and 50% in most of the rest except for its fully-held lead shop, CDP & Partners, London. Advertising organization totals comprising the ranking are a composite of CDP's equity in gross income and billings in each agency listed in the profile. Totals may include holdings in non-media

Gross income and billings are U.S.$ in thousands.

Notes: Dollars are in millions. Clemenger is 46.67% held by BBDO, which includes that equity in its results. (See Omnicom profile Page S-43). Clemenger had a slight year-to-year increase in gross income in Australian dollars, but a 2.45% decline in the Australian dollar against the U.S. dollar left the agency with an overall decline in gross income and volume. AA maintains constant exchange rates from year to year.

Dai-Ichi Kikaku Thailand, Bangkok(MJ)	7.8
DIK-Ocean Advertising, Taipei(MJ)	19.4
Sanyo Agency, Tokyo(MJ)	58.3

Notes: Dollars are in millions. Dai-Ichi Kikaku results were affected by a 7.1% decline in the Japanese yen against the U.S. dollar. Dai-Ichi largely holds majority equity in its affiliated companies, all based in Tokyo. These agencies include Sanyu (MJ), Dai-Ichi Communications (MJ), Tokyo Bijutsu (printing-MN), DIK Rapp & Collins (MJ), I&S (MN), DDB Needham Japan (MN), Village (graphic design-JV), Nap (graphic design-MN), How (MJ), Cross Media Japan, (sales promo, commercial production-JV). Together they provided $15 million in gross income on $90.4 million in billings in 1990. Dai-Ichi's domestic network of nine shops spread throughout Japan contributed $4 million gross income on billings of $11.1 million. Internationally, DIK holds minority equity with DDB Needham Worldwide in shops in Hong Kong, Singapore and Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, and 50% of Kresser Craig DIK in Santa Monica, Calif. Apart from its equity in agencies, Dai-Ichi also holds equity in two U.S. agency holding companies: Omnicom Group at 2.44% and Mickelberry at 4.7%. AA does not count such passive investments by agencies in agency holdings companies, and omitted $35.9 million in gross income from Dai-Ichi numbers.

Notes: Dollars are in millions. D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles' totals include billings from Manning, Selvage & Lee, its public relations unit. In the U.S., DMB&B sold its San Francisco unit in 1990. On the international level, MS&L took equity of 40% in Tokyu Manning Selvage & Lee, a joint venture with Tokyu Agency International. DMB&B owns 24.5% of the new venture. DMB&B divested much of its Dublin, Ireland, agency business, reducing its holdings from 100% to 15%. DMB&B also folded its Saudi Arabia and Switzerland units and merged the remaining business in regional shops. In 1990, DMB&B bought one of London's biggest independent ad agencies, Yellowhammer. DMB&B figures also include those of its medical unit, Medicus Intercon International. Medicus added three U.S. offices in 1990 in boosting U.S. billings by 67.7%, but its fully owned international operations remained its largest contributor, accounting for 58% of Medicus' overall billings. D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles' organization totals comprising its ranking are a composite of its equity in gross income and billings in each agency listed in the profile. Totals also include holdings in non-media advertising businesses not listed. Each shop broken out under DMB&B is by 100% of its billings.

Notes: Dollars are in millions. Dentsu, Y&R Partnership was formed out of HDM Worldwide's U.S. and Asian properties after Eurocom bought HDM's European operations from its other partners, Dentsu Inc. and Young & Rubicam. The partnership's U.S. operation includes Lord, Dentsu & Partners, a merger of Lord, Einstein, O'Neill & Partners (which had been 49% owned by Y&R) and HDM's U.S. properties. Under Lord Dentsu is the direct response unit, Bowes Dentsu & Partners (formerly HDM Worldwide Direct), an agency that includes Muldoon Agency, New York, and Stone & Adler, Chicago. HDM's former Asian and Australasian operations comprise the international side, which represents 78% of overall billings of the joint venture. DY&R Partnership totals do not include Lord, Einstein, O'Neill & Partners returns for 1990. DY&R organization totals comprising its ranking are a composite of its equity in each agency listed in the profile. The break out for each shop in boldface is by 100% of its billings.

He knows the difference between a Nyquist curve and a demand curve.

Today's highly charged, high-tech corporate environment demands bilingual management, as fluent in the language of the laboratory as in the idioms of the boardroom.

Terrence McGarty, Corporate Director, Applied Research at NYNEX is just such a manager. Among his three MIT degrees is a PhD in Electrical Engineering. In addition to charting the course for the Applied Research Laboratories at the NYNEX Science & Technology Center, he manages the corporate venture capital funds and has authored a recently published book on business planning for entrepreneurs.

As the head of an organization committed to developing and delivering cutting edge technology that is as easy to use as the telephone, McGarty needs a magazine that goes beyond surface coverage.

He is one of 500,000 scientific/engineering professionals who read SPECTRUM magazine to gain useful insight into emerging state-of-the art technologies that will direct their roles in shaping our tomorrows.

SPECTRUM—essential, relevant, informative. Reaching readers who create tomorrow, today.

Notes: Dollars are in millions. Eurocom Group is a Paris-based agency holding company whose advertising subsidiaries are placed under two holding companies: Eurocom Advertising S.A., a 100%-owned entity that includes all of Eurocom's French and Continental Europe operations, and Eurocom Advertising Ltd., a group 60%-owned. The latter is composed of agencies WCRS in the U.K., Della Femina, McNamee in the U.S. and the Bali Partnership, a network of agencies in Asia. Eurocom also holds 15% equity in Aegis Group, a U.K. holding company that owns 40% of the agency units under Eurocom Advertising Ltd.; and 100% of Carat, Europe's largest media buying company. (See story about Aegis on Page S-4.) AA does not count the Aegis equity, which amounts to $79.5 million in gross income and $530 million in billings. Carat handles media buying for many of Eurocom's agencies in Europe (outside France). Organization totals comprising the Eurocom ranking are a composite of Eurocom's equity in gross income and billings in each agency listed in the profile. Totals also include some non-media advertising businesses not listed. The breakout for each shop under Eurocom is by 100% of its billings.

Notes: Dollars are in millions. FCAB is a holding company that encompasses FCA! Group and Bloom Cos. under a single tier. Dallas-based Bloom was acquired in early 1991. Bloom figures, representing all of FCAB's U.S. returns, were folded into both years. Without Bloom, FCAB's gross income grew 30.9% from year to year. Advertising represents 80% of this holding company, the remainder of which comes from its various marketing services (PR, media buying, bartering, etc.) business in France.

tising organization. (See profile on Page S-45.) The Chicago operation is a consolidation of FCB's U.S., South American, Australasian and Asian units. Publicis-FCB Communications B.V., formed in 1989, is an alliance between FCB and Publicis Communications, the advertising side of Paris-based Publicis S.A., a holding company. FCB essentially folded its European shops into the venture, taking 49% of the equity and Publicis 51%. Most Publicis and FCB offices in the same markets have since merged into a single office. A few have remained separate "to provide distinction and to avoid client conflicts," according to officials at B.V. This is the case in France, Portugal and the UK. FCB totals are a composite of its equity in gross income and billings in each agency listed in the profile. The breakout shown for each shop is by 100% of its billings. Billings by U.S. office are AA estimates.

Hakuhodo UK, London(MJ)	7.7

Notes: Dollars are in millions. Hakuhodo's slight year-to-year growth was affected by a 7.1% decline in the Japanese yen against the dollar. More than 90% of its billings are in Japanese yen. Hakuhodo picked up three new offices in 1990, including Hakuhodo France in Boulogne, Hakuhodo Photo Creative and Incentive Promotions, the latter two in Tokyo. Hakuhodo generally owns 50% or more of its agencies. Figures include equity portions of two joint ventures with agencies under the Interpublic Group of Cos. banner: McCann-Erickson Hakuhodo (49% owned by Hakuhodo) and Hakuhodo:Lintas Co., (50% owned). Hakuhodo organization totals comprising its ranking are a composite of the parent's equity in gross income and billings in each agency listed in the profile. Totals also include holdings in non-media advertising businesses not listed. The breakout for each shop listed is by 100% of its billings.

Notes: Dollars are in millions. Interpublic Group of Cos. includes three agency networks: McCann-Erickson Worldwide, Lintas:Worldwide and Lowe Group, the latter coming under the IPG umbrella in 1990. Lowe includes a worldwide network of agencies anchored in the U.S. by Laurence, Charles, Free & Lawson and in the U.K. by Lowe Howard-Spink. Lowe also includes specialist services, graphic design, direct marketing, sponsorship and sales promotion units as well as communications subsidiaries. Lowe Bell Communications, a major U.K. public relations operation, is owned 24.5% by IPG. Interpublic totals are a composite of its equity in gross income and billings in each agency listed in the profile. Billings for each shop represent 100% of returns, but tabular data showing totals for McCann-Erickson Worldwide, Lintas:Worldwide and Lowe Group is on an equity basis. Billings by U.S. office for M-E and Lintas are AA estimates.

Notes: Dollars are in millions. Omnicom Group is an agency holding company with four groupings: BBDO Worldwide, DDB Needham Worldwide, Tracy-Locke and Diversified Agencies Services. Two Omnicom agencies were sold in 1990: Ammirati & Puris to its management and Blair Advertising to Eric Mower & Associates, Syracuse. Results for both agencies were omitted from Omnicom totals for both years. A&P had gross income of $30.6 million and $28.6 million for the comparable years, respectively, and Blair had gross income of $3 million and $3.8 million. During the year, DDB Needham added Denmark, Thailand and New Zealand shops to its network. IN A RECESSION, THE BEST DEFENSE IS A GOOD OFFENSE.

It's a recession. Your instincts demand that you cut the ad budget. But, as the McGraw-Hill Research[1] analysis of business-to-business advertising expenditures during the 1981-82 recession shows, it's those with the courage to maintain or increase advertising in a recession who reap a major sales advantage over their competitors who panic and fall back into a defensive posture. And this advantage continues to expand long after the recession is over.

McGraw-Hill Research, 1986.

Recessions last an average of 11 months, but any advertising decision made during one can have permanent repercussions. The McGraw-Hill study demonstrates that nervous advertisers lose ground to the brave and can't gain it back. In 1980, according to the chart seen here, sales indices were identical, but by 1985 the brave had racked up a 3.2 to 1 sales advantage. A similar study done by McGraw-Hill during the 1974-75 recession corroborates the 1980's research.

A recession is the single greatest period in which to make short- and long-term gains. And, surprisingly, increasing advertising modestly during one has much the same effect on your profits as cutting advertising does. According to The Center for Research & Development's October 1990 study of consumer advertising during a recession, advertisers who yield "to the natural inclination to cut spending in an effort to increase profits in a recession find that it doesn't work."[2] This study, relying on the PIMS[3] database, also uncovered that aggressive recessionary advertisers picked up 4.5 times as much market share gain as their overcautious competitors, leaving them in a far better position to exploit the inevitable recovery and expansion.

Chevrolet countered its competitors during the 1974-75 recession by aggressively beefing up its ad spending and attained a two percent market share increase. Today, two share points in the automotive industry are worth over $4 billion. Delta Airlines and Revlon also boosted ad spending in the 1974-75 recession and achieved similar results.

Continuous advertising sustains market leadership. And it's far easier to sustain momentum than it is to start it up again. Consider this list of market category leaders: Campbell's, Coca-Cola, Ivory, Kellogg, Kodak, Lipton and Wrigley. This is the leadership list for 1925. And 1990. These marketers have maintained a relentless commitment to their brands in both good times and bad. Kellogg had the guts to pump up its ad spending during the Great Depression and cemented a market leadership it has yet to relinquish.

These are the success stories. Space and diplomacy don't allow the mention of the names of those who lacked gusto and chose to cut their ad spending in recessionary times.

But if you would like to learn more about how advertising can help make the worst of times the best of times, please write to Department C, American Association of Advertising Agencies, 666 Third Avenue, New York, New York 10017, enclosing a check for five dollars. You will receive a booklet covering the pertinent research done on all the U.S. recessions since 1923. Please allow 4 to 6 weeks for delivery.

Notes: Dollars are in millions. Publicis-FCB Communications B.V. comprises the European shops of Foote, Cone & Belding Communications and Publicis Communications, the advertising arm of Publicis S.A., Paris. It grew out of an alliance struck between FCB and Publicis that involved an exchange of stock. Publicis owns 51% of B.V. and FCB 49%, a total folded into FCB (see profile Page S-37). The breakout for each B.V. shop is by 100% of its billings. Apart from AA's treatment of B.V., Foote, Cone & Belding Communications submitted to AA data reflecting an entity called FCB-Publicis that equaled 100% of FCB and 100% of Publicis-FCB Communications B.V. FCB asserts that B.V. is part of a single operating system with FCB's U.S., Asian and South American properties and should be included on a wholly-owned basis. Publicis Inc., New York, still reports to B.V.

What's in it for you?

Market access. Pure and simple.

Because the Asahi Shimbun is Japan's most widely read and influential daily newspaper. A power-house media vehicle reaching more than 8,000,000 households and offices every day. With the majority home-delivered.

And to families where professional, executive and management profiles predominate. Where home ownership is most common. And income significantly above the national average.

Quality reader-access that attracts quality advertisers who appreciate the unrivalled reach of the paper, as well as the cost-effectiveness of its regional-/national-edition options.

So if your clients are looking to make a name for themselves in Japan, take a look at the Asahi Shimbun. You'll find there's more in it for all of you.

Notes: Dollars are in millions. Saatchi & Saatchi Co. is a London-based holding company with two major agency groups: Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide and Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide. On an organizational basis, virtually all U.S. agencies whether grouped under SSAW or BSBW report to the holding company. McCaffrey & McCall, New York, an agency under the SSAW arm, was sold to management in 1991 and is excluded from both 1990 and 1989 results. SSAW holds majority equity in most of its international shops but in many cases operates on a contractual basis with no equity involved. In those cases, AA excludes all returns of such shops. Saatchi had $333 million in non-equity billings and equivalent gross income omitted from its submitted totals. BSBW had $495 million in non-equity billings and equivalent gross income omitted from its totals. BSBW claims that although it holds no equity in most of its Latin American agencies, some 20-25% of billings from those shops is from network accounts needing service in Latin America. The holding company sold its consulting division during 1990. Totals for this division, which contributed about $3 billion in billings in 1989, were omitted for both years. Saatchi group's organization totals comprising its ranking are a composite of the parent's equity in gross income and billings in each agency listed in the profile. Totals also include non-media advertising businesses not listed. The breakout for each shop or network is by 100% of its billings, except for Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide and Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide, which are broken out on an equity basis.

Baker Lovick wins

der sides by the glue gun.

A woman then climbs the ladder and stands on a scaffold. Her weight is shown as 105 pounds. But a 265-pound man follows. The commercial closes with the words, "The new heat and glue system from Black & Decker."

"The advertising had a big impact on sales," said Barry Bousfield, Black & Decker's advertising and sales promotion manager. "Just those five products that were advertised sold out."

Mr. Damast also wrote commercials for Chrysler Canada, but unlike the Black & Decker spots, these 30-second commercials barely showed the product.

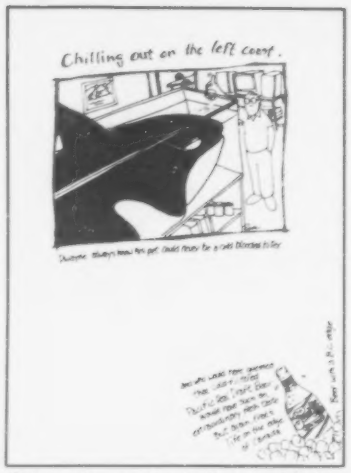
One Chrysler commercial starts with the blue and white German highway sign "Autobahn" on the screen. There's the sound of a speeding car, then the flash of a red automobile whizzing by. There are pastoral shots of the countryside, close-ups of the medians, a shot of an overpass.

As the unrecognizable red car zooms, the voice-over says: "You are watching one of the most remarkable engines on the German Autobahn. The 2.5-liter multipoint E-F-I turbo with two balance shafts. This outstanding piece of technology is shared by only two manufacturers. One of them is Porsche. The other is Chrysler. Catch it, if you can."

The spot closes with what is now one of the best-known shots in Canada. In front of a setting sun, Chrysler cars, trucks and vans emerge on the crest of two hills. There's a synthesizer and guitar "power chord," and then the slogan, "Chrysler Canada—changing the landscape."

Mr. Damast, along with Senior Art Director Bernard Romano, created the end shot, which is known around Baker Lovick simply as "that shot."

"I think the phrase was first coined by a GM executive when he saw it at a recording studio one day," Mr. Damast said. "Somebody told us about it, and ever since that time we refer to it as 'that shot.' " Mr. Damast was inspired by old Western movies' shots of Indians on horses appearing on a hill.



Offbeat humor is a hallmark of Baker Lovick's creative.

Baker Lovick also used humor effectively in a John Deere commercial where just about everything goes wrong.

The spot starts with a ringing alarm clock. A hand reaches over to turn it off and hits the clock, which falls to the floor. The sound of something breaking is heard.

A bathrobe-clad man then appears before a bathroom sink. The faucet breaks; a stream of water gushes into his face. His electric toothbrush goes haywire and the brush flies off the handle.

The hapless man is next seen opening his front door, just in time to be struck on the forehead by a flying newspaper. Back in the bathroom, an electric razor snags the skin on his cheek.

When the man opens his garage door, a smile flickers across his face as he spots a lawn tractor sitting in a ray of sunlight. The voice-over: "When you find something in life that works as well or lasts as long as a John Deere lawn and garden tractor, buy it."

While spots like these have made Baker Lovick a hot shop, it wasn't always the case.

In 1971, the agency became Baker Lovick with the merger of Baker Advertising and James Lovick Ltd.

A year later, Baker Lovick bought Grant International, an agency laden with debt. As a result, Baker Lovick lost the backing of BBDO, which had owned 35% of Baker Advertising. Starting in 1973, unprofitable offices were sold, with the last chunk gone by 1975. In 1978, BBDO repurchased 35% of Baker Lovick and later increased its share to 49%.

Then Baker Lovick developed an image problem.

"Baker Lovick was always a well-known agency, a very well-managed agency." Mr. Mills said. "But it didn't have a very high profile as an agency and it didn't have a terribly good creative reputation, whether that was right or wrong.

"This is a fashion business in a way. You're either hot or you're not. And a lot of people want to work with an agency that is fashionable. And Baker Lovick in that context was not all that fashionable."

When he came on board, Mr. Mills chose to tackle the problem through the creative process. And since the arrival of Mr. Damast, he said, "the whole level of the work has just lifted dramatically."

Baker Lovick has "made huge leaps forward creatively," said Allen Rosenshine, BBDO Worldwide chairman-ceo. "Really I think they've become a major player in our network in two stages. The first is in the general management area in Peter Mills . . . (who) energized the agency and has been building relationships with U.S. shared brands. The second is Peter's revitalization of creative," which Mr. Rosenshine called "superb."

Past winners: International

1989—Contrapunto, Spain
1988—DDB Needham, U.K.
1987—Dentsu, Japan
1986—Mojo MDA, Australia
1985—Lowe Howard-Spink Marschalk, U.K.
1984—Prins, Meijer, Stamenkovits & van Walbeek, Netherlands

In developing advertising, Mr. Mills said, the agency relies heavily on research.

Campaign planning was used effectively in a commercial for the British Columbia Lottery Corp.'s game called Punto, in which people try to pick the winners of sports events.

While people love to win fabulous prizes, just the fun of picking a winner was in itself a big drawing card, the agency found. The result of that research was a 30-second spot called "Cool Guy."

Opening shot: A man in a white dress shirt and conservative tie calmly says, "I play Punto because it adds a little fun to weekend hockey games." Cut away to the same man, now sloppily dressed, his nose inches away from a TV screen, screaming in wild abandon.

The conservative counterpart returns to say, "Excited? I wouldn't say I get excited." Cut to the man's living room. He's now doing a little victory dance.

Back to the calm, conservative chap: "I guess there's a certain pride when you pick a winner," he says. Cut to the wild man, now swinging his hips and chanting, "Who's bad? I'm bad." A woman rolls her eyes in exasperation.

The conservative man says, "Sometimes you lose." The wild man rips up his Punto ticket and throws it into the roaring fireplace.

"Sometimes you win," the conservative man says, a slight smile marking his first real emotion. Cut again. The wild man is now blowing on the burning ticket he pulled from the fireplace. "Hey, it's only a game," says the conservative man as his wild side, chanting "Yes, yes," smashes a fist onto a table, turning over a candy bowl. "Nice move, George," says his wife.

Peter Stringham, general manager of the Vancouver office, said some of the agency's best work, such as "Cool Guy," is being done by longtime employees, such as Group Creative Head Steve Brook and Senior Art Director Doug Smith.

"There was real talent in this shop," he said. "They just needed the opportunity to shine; [and once the opportunity came,] boy, it didn't take them any time." □

Agency

striving to protect profits, chipped away still more at budgets, changed marketing plans, postponed new-product efforts, altered media schedules to use new promotional options, went after more stringent compensation deals and "managed" assets by combining, shutting down or unloading divisions and entire companies. They generally rearranged agency/client relationships as never before in advertising history.

Also, recessions historically lead clients to demand more "steak," less "sizzle," less break-the-mold creativity, and 1990 was no different.

On the receiving end of this bad-news bombardment, agencies had to remain focused on satisfying their more demanding clients. Meanwhile, they had to work harder just to manage their own business, reward and retain key creative and account people, seek out new-business prospects and mount campaigns to reel them in, and build stronger creative departments. All this while somehow trimming payroll and overhead costs to compensate for reduced revenue flow and profitability and developing proficiency in such areas as sales promotion and direct response marketing.

Some were distracted by complex financial negotiations involving agency principals and possible buyers. Under such trying conditions, they were hard pressed to nurture a creative spark, and if they fell short of adding new excitement and brightness to their work, it wasn't for lack of trying.

There were simply too many distractions to overcome.

Perhaps the real lesson is that when no one shop emerges as Agency of the Year, when it takes all their strength and energy just to survive the roughest of years, then in a sense they're all winners. □

IF YOU THOUGHT PARK BENCHES WERE ST. PETERSBURG'S MOST POPULAR SEATS. . .

You'd better sit down for this.

While St. Petersburg — and the entire Tampa Bay area — was once considered a sleepy place, full of retirees, this is no longer true. In fact, the volume of new, young residents arriving in the St. Petersburg area has lowered the city's median age by nearly eight years since 1980.

So it's not surprising that some of the best seats in town are now those in Tampa Bay's performing arts centers. Thousands of people enjoy the area's diverse cultural offerings, including the world-renowned Salvador Dali Museum, the Florida Orchestra, dozens of art galleries, and a wide variety of professional dance and theater groups.

And it's not surprising either that Tampa Bay keeps up with the Times. The St. Petersburg Times, Tampa Bay's largest newspaper, beats the Tampa Tribune in circulation by more than 75,000 papers daily and nearly 77,500 on Sunday.*

So sit up and take notice of Tampa Bay. Call 1-800-333-7505 for the latest information on this thriving market and the newspaper that serves it best.

Notes: Dollars are in millions. WPP Group is a London-based holding company whose media advertising business, representing 68% of its returns, is concentrated in three trunk agencies, J. Walter Thompson Co., Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide and Scali, McCabe, Sloves. A fourth network, Conquest Europe, was set up in Europe to service the Alfa-Romeo account. Non-media advertising business is concentrated in a huge public relations arm that includes Hill & Knowlton, Carl Byoir & Associates and Ogilvy Public Relations Group among others; market research that includes MRB Group; and various graphics and design, incentive and motivation, audio-visual and video communications, and sales promotion divisions. WPP's totals comprising its ranking are a composite of its equity in gross income and billings in agencies listed in the profile. Totals also include holdings in non-media advertising businesses not listed. Breakouts for the tabular data summarizing results of JWT, O&M and SMS are on an equity basis. The breakout for individual shops in boldface is by 100% of billings.

Notes: Dollars are in millions. Young & Rubicam is an advertising agency that includes the core Y&R "brand" shops worldwide, its joint investment with Dentsu Inc. in Dentsu, Young & Rubicam Partnership, and a roster of specialized marketing services subsidiaries, the largest being its PR unit, Burson-Marsteller. DY&R Partnership was formed in late 1990 out of HDM Worldwide. It represents the HDM units in the U.S. and Asia. HDM's European operations were bought by the third partner in HDM, Eurocom. DY&R Partnership, a 50/50 joint venture, also is a Top 50 agency organization. (See DY&R profile on Page S-35.) Y&R's totals include 50% of the Partnership. Partnership totals, however, do not include Lord Einstein O'Neill & Partners, which is now part of Partnership's U.S. operations. Y&R composites include its 49% ownership in LEO&P for 1990 and 1989. Y&R's totals comprising its ranking are a composite of the parent's equity in gross income and billings in each agency listed in the profile. Totals also include holdings in nonmedia advertising businesses not listed. The breakout by shops is by 100% of billings, except for Y&R "brand" agency, which is by equity. On an international level, Y&R includes billings for Cato Johnson, Chapman Direct, Sudler & Hennessey, Landor and Wunderman Worldwide and Burson-Marsteller in its listings.

Notes: Dollars are in millions. Information in this chart is compiled from media breakouts supplied by 476 of 558 U.S.-based agencies. Not all agencies break out media for AA. * Figures may be slightly high because some agencies combine network, syndicated and cable TV billings into spot, and network radio into spot radio.

Notes on foreign agencies

Advertising Age's 47th ranking of foreign agencies lists for the first time, together with 1990 and 1989 exchange rates for each country, a percentage showing fluctuations in the exchange rates.

These fluctuations are most apparent in Latin American countries, with Argentina, Brazil and Peru leading with a 90% average decline of local currency compared to the U.S. dollar.

In Europe most currencies appreciated by an average of 15% compared to the U.S. dollar and in Asia the decline was limited to approximately 7%.

A result of these fluctuations is that at times agencies in certain countries can show an increase over the previous year in gross income and billings in local currency but find that advantage disappears when the local currency figure is changed into U.S. dollars.

In these charts, an agency's equity position is indicated as follows:

MJ Majority-owned, 51%-100%
MN Minority-owned, 1%-49%
NE No equity
NA Not applicable
JV 50/50 joint venture

RAISE? WHAT RAISE?

Agency, media company among employees taking it on chin; many to look for new jobs

It's one mean year out there in paycheck land.

According to the 201 respondents of the January FaxTrack poll, 31.3% did not receive a 1991 pay raise.

This news came as a shock to most. More than 62% of the respondents expected at least a 5% raise.

Ad agency and media company employees were hit hardest.

More than 57% of agency personnel and 50% of media company employees who responded went home on Jan. 15 without a bigger check.

Only 10.5% of advertiser employees got a goose-egg during their pay review.

Advertiser company employees also received the biggest bumps up: 78.9% received at least a 5% increase, compared with 35.6% of agency and just more than 33% of media company employees.

This may be a big year for mac-and-cheese dinners. About half of media company personnel, and almost 43% of agency employees, say their standard of living will drop this year, compared with 32.8% of the total sample.

As a result, resumes will be flying. Some 50% of agency and 41.7% of media company workers say they'll seek new jobs.

The employees may want to move to the client side where only 10.5% plan to look for greener pastures in 1991 and a sizable 47% say raises reflect job performance. ☐

AGENCIES HOLD FIRM ON BENEFITS

Despite budget cuts, shops would rather raise deductibles than slash programs

By Alicia Lasek

Agency personnel may have been hit hard by layoffs and cuts in clients' ad budgets, but human resources directors say they should not worry agencies will start cutting corners in the benefits department.

Ad agencies will be reluctant to change benefit programs now after holding up under economic pressure for so long, says Hugh Coughlan, senior VP-human resources at Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos.

"If the economy dictates it, you'll see companies dealing with direct compensation before they reduce benefits," he says. "They may raise co-payments or deductibles, but the basic benefits will stay the same."

Some agencies have gone beyond the traditional employee benefits programs, providing childcare referral or on-site daycare, job-sharing and telecommuting for personnel who wish to work from their homes.

Leo Burnett Co.'s 2-year-old elder-care referral program and its family workshops at its New York office are getting strong turnouts—usually about 35 to 50 people attend.

"We've expanded our benefits program to include working women and parents in general," says Compensation Manager Sue Holsinger.

Sue Engle, senior VP-corporate personnel and facilities at Ketchum Communications, thinks more agencies will incorporate childcare progams, despite the costs.

"I think [agencies] are stalling on it because childcare is very expensive. But there has to be more flexibility with all the women in the workplace," the Ketchum executive says.

Advertising Age contacted the 25 top-billing domestic U.S. ad agencies to get the big picture on both basic and non-traditional benefits they offer. The 15 that responded report below what their employees receive above and beyond a paycheck. ☐

N.Y. tabloids to strut their stuff

By Cynthia Rigg
Crain News Service

NEW YORK—Ad campaigns for this city's tabloids are about to hit high gear following British media mogul Robert Maxwell's purchase of the Daily News.

Local airwaves are likely to be filled with promotions as the News fights to recover from a five-month strike.

Last weekend, the News launched a media blitz with its "We're back. Buy us" campaign. And this week, New York Newsday is stepping up its efforts.

"In a normal year, the News was spending around $5.5 million on advertising," said John Campi, the paper's VP-director of promotion and public relations. "We intend to be much more aggressive than that, although we have not set a definite budget."

He said the News is also considering using circulation-building programs, including contests.

The ad theme was suggested by Mr. Maxwell, who bought the paper from Tribune Co. One of Mr. Maxwell's other demands to agency Gearon Hoffman Conlon & Nye was harder to fulfill. He insisted the commercials include the song, "New York, New York," to which the paper had tried unsuccessfully to secure the rights several years ago.

Mr. Maxwell himself contacted EMI, which owns the song, and negotiated a one-year deal.

"This illustrates the speed of my decisionmaking," Mr. Maxwell said. "I negotiated the rights to the song in hours when it usually takes months. It also illustrates my contribution to creative marketing."

R. Maxwell

Mr. Maxwell does voice-over on the 10- and 15-second spots but doesn't appear on camera.

One of the spots shows a bundle of Daily News issues sporting the headline "We're back."

The first wave of commercials will run for a week, to be followed by a second flight, the creative for which has yet to be determined.

The tabloid's unions are planning an ad campaign of their own, said George McDonald, president of the Allied Printing Trades Council.

"In a week or two down the road, we will be doing some sort of advertising in several different newspapers," he said. "We will be asking people to buy the News."

The March 22 issue, the first published under Mr. Maxwell, carried a 40¢ cover price, up from 35¢, and 88 ad pages.

Mr. Campi said he's confident circulation can return to prestrike levels of more than 1 million. The March 22 issue had a pressrun of 1.2 million.

The News is currently charging advertisers "interim" rates but will establish a new rate card and circulation guarantee effective April 1, executives said.

No promotions are planned to win back advertisers at this point. "The promotion that has to be done to get back the advertising is to get back the readers," Mr. Campi said.

The News isn't the only paper hustling to get its message out. This week, New York Newsday is breaking a TV commercial featuring columnist Gail Collins.

The paper is also planning a series of TV commercials starting in the next few weeks that go head-to-head with the Daily News.

Late last week, Newsday stole one of the News' stars by hiring away syndicated columnist Liz Smith.

A spokeswoman for the paper said it has already begun shooting commercials featuring Ms. Smith and that "she will play a big part in our ad plans." □

Liability

face of partnership."

If clients are liable, he said, "maybe we should pay commissions to the clients."

Mr. Losee said Knapp wouldn't accept contracts from agencies calling for sequential liability.

"There's going to be hell to pay if I see one," he said.

From the agency point of view, "the issue is simple," said one agency executive. "If clients are going to pay the agency a 15% commission, then the agency will take the risk. If they won't, then it's 'Screw you, you take the risk.' "

Even though some agencies have already adopted the sequential liability policy, other agency executives pointed out that breaking the tradition of the old system may further weaken agency-client relationships.

These executives believe some clients consider the assumption of liability as part of the service an agency offers and aren't sure how advertisers will react to the change.

On March 21, Magazine Publishers of America President Don Kummerfeld and Exec VP James Guthrie met with Four A's President John O'Toole and Exec VP Burt Drake to discuss the liability issues.

"We don't want to go to war with the agency world," Mr. Kummerfeld said after the meeting.

"I think they understood what our concern is a little better, which would certainly help us resolve it if it can be resolved amicably. And we understand their concerns. They don't want to get stuck holding the bag. We don't want to get stuck holding the bag."

But the MPA isn't giving in to the concept of sequential liability.

"The sensible solution is dual liability, and we'd like to find a way to make it work," Mr. Kummerfeld said.

Several publishers, including Knapp and Time Inc. Magazine Co., have switched from sole to dual liability contracts in recent years.

Mr. Guthrie said the next step is bringing the issue before the MPA board on May 7, its next scheduled meeting. Messrs. Guthrie and Kummerfeld will then meet the following week with the Four A's board.

As for the broadcast media, the Broadcast Cable Financial Management Association and its Broadcast Cable Credit Association unit recently rescinded their 17-year-old sole liability policy.

The BCFMA recommends financial policies to broadcast and cable networks and now endorses a policy of "joint and several liability," which makes both the advertiser and agency responsible for the payment of media contracts. That's because "there's no way to discern when liability shifts from the advertiser to the agency," said Bob McAuliffe, executive director.

Advertisers are just starting to study the effects the liability changes could have.

Kraft General Foods is "very interested in the subject," said Marshall Garber, financial director of its Media Services Group and a member of the Association of National Advertisers' Advertising Financial Management Committee. "We are studying it seriously, but we have not reached a decision."

D. Kummerfeld

Jim Zambito, advertising finance manager for Johnson & Johnson, said it's too early to tell what the company's position will be because the issue has cropped up so quickly.

Although Four A's officials indicated the ANA would soon endorse the sequential liability system, it won't be formally discussed until the ANA's Advertising Financial Management Conference in May.

"In the old days, starting in 1940, the Four A's advocated agency sole liability for payment to media," said Four A's Exec VP Harry Paster. "One of the things agencies did to earn a commission was to take the credit risk."

That continued, he said, "until the networks decided they wanted everybody liable."

The issue came up for re-examination two years ago, Mr. Paster said.

"We took a look at what's going on in the real world," he said. "Well, the real world has changed. There have been a hell of a lot of bankruptcies. A lot of agencies have gotten hurt—terribly hurt—by bankruptcies. And the structure of how agencies get paid has changed."

The sequential liability idea was proposed by Bob James, chairman of McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, when he was a director of the Four A's.

Mr. James last week said McCann was going to move to adopt sequential liability, adding that he didn't think it's an important issue for clients.

"Maybe when [sole liability] was started, clients saw a benefit," Mr. James said. "How a client could see a benefit in using it to protect themselves in a bankruptcy situation we can't conceive. I think [advertisers] have always felt that when they committed [to buying media], they owed the money.

"I think what the agency business is saying is, if we've collected the money, OK, but if we haven't, we can't take the sole liability. As compensation goes down, it becomes all the more of an issue."

Mr. James acknowledged the media "have been squawking, but it's unrealistic for them, in my mind, to think that they could recover money from the agencies that the agencies never had."

But other agencies are still evaluating whether they want to make the change.

"Historically, we've taken the hit," said Charles D. Peebler Jr., ceo of Bozell, while suggesting that times have changed and that the policy should be re-examined.

Young & Rubicam Exec VP R. John Cooper said his agency hadn't yet come to a decision, though Y&R Chairman Alex Kroll is vice chairman of the Four A's and presumably supported its recommendation.

Agency sources said senior Y&R media and account executives were meeting to assess the effect a change from sole liability would have on client relationships.

The new policy may be best received by small agencies, which are most at risk when one of their clients fails. Smaller shops need the support of the industry to persuade clients it's not the agency's job to pay for ad time and space.

"The big agencies' clients, the Philip Morrises, don't go bankrupt," said Felix Kent, senior partner at Hall, Dickler, Lawler, Kent & Friedman, a law firm that advises more than 60 agencies. "It's the little guy who's got a small account that may go belly up." □ whether the train is too far out of the station. If IBM expects to succeed, they'll have to make up for lost ground," said William Bluestein, analyst at Forrester Research.

IBM

Toshiba, the No. 1 notebook company with 24% of market, isn't taking IBM's introduction lying down. It plans to launch its own campaign next week for its newest portable, the T2000SX. It's been in the marketplace since January but hasn't been advertised yet. The T2000SX is aimed at virtually the same audience as IBM's new computer. Toshiba's computer is powered with the same 386SX chip and carries a similar price, about $5,000.

Within a year, IBM will probably garner a "midsingle digits" market share, said Bill Johnson, VP-general manager for Toshiba America's Computer Systems Division. That will come primarily at the expense of Toshiba and Compaq, as "some portion" of their Fortune 500 accounts return to IBM, he said.

But most customers have learned to live without IBM portables, Mr. Johnson said. Toshiba and Compaq will be able to hold onto most of their customer base because IBM's portable has no obvious technical or pricing edge over the competition, he said.

IBM "let the market get away from them," he said. "They're not going to take away the lead of Toshiba and Compaq. I still think it's a two-horse race."

Compaq, which has close to a 20% share of the notebook market, has no comparable machine to IBM's and Toshiba's new entries, said John Dunkle, VP at WorkGroup Technologies, a market research company. But Compaq will introduce one before summer, priced around $5,000, he said.

Compaq has achieved its No. 2 position with its popular, slightly less powerful notebook, the LTE/-286. It also has a more powerful unit, the LTE 386s/20.

"We have a very aggressive campaign in place for our notebook computer [the LTE 386s/20], which is in very high demand and has a significant share of the market," said Bob Beach, manager of media relations. "We will continue to be aggressive in that product market."

Apple Computer is also waiting in the wings. The company says it plans to have two new lightweight machines on the market by yearend. In an unprecedented move, Apple has gone to two Japanese companies, Sony Corp. and Toshiba Corp., to help develop laptop and notebook computers, trade reports say.

Both Apple and IBM have flopped with their earlier attempts at portable computing. IBM's previous two entries were too heavy and out of touch with the market. Apple has fared poorly with its Macintosh Portable, criticized as overweight (15 pounds, twice that of top-selling competitors) and overpriced since its 1989 introduction.

Apple last month cut the portable's base price by more than $1,000 to $4,199 and added features in a move to stimulate sales.

IBM "let the market get away from them. They're not going to take away the lead of Toshiba and Compaq."

Analysts say Apple is a strong contender to break into the ranks of the top five portable vendors in the next year.

IBM may have a tougher time.

But IBM likely will be among the top 10 portable marketers "considering their product is at least average in features, performance, price," said Peter Teige, senior analyst with InfoCorp, a market research company.

"Being IBM, they don't have to be first and they frequently are not first, and that does not seem to matter," Mr. Teige said.

IBM advertising, via Lintas: New York, will emphasize the computer's power.

"It's being presented as having the power of a desktop computer," said a source familiar with the advertising.

IBM spends about $125 million annually to advertise all its products.

The new Toshiba campaign will be the first effort for the marketer from Chiat/Day/Mojo, Venice, Calif. Chiat took over the $15 million account from Ayer Tuttle, Los Angeles, earlier this year.

Spreads in The Wall Street Journal and USA Today will compare the evolution of man and computers. □

Nestle taps McCann

SAN FRANCISCO—Nestle Beverage Co. last week consolidated most of its estimated $65 million account at McCann-Erickson Worldwide's offices here and New York. McCann's New York office won the estimated $18 million Coffee-mate business from Dailey & Associates, Los Angeles, and the $9 million Nestea brand from J. Walter Thompson USA, New York. The McCann offices will now handle about $52 million in Nestle Beverage spending. Other Nestle Beverage agencies are Hal Riney & Partners here; Cohen/Johnson, Los Angeles; and Bloom FCA, Dallas. Separately, parent Nestle USA, Glendale, Calif., this month will name agencies for its estimated $300 million media buying account (AA, Jan. 14).

Philip Morris tilts to food

With Miles at helm, course is plotted for global growth

Mike Miles' rise to the top

- 1961: After graduating from Northwestern University with a bachelor's degree in advertising, rose to VP-account supervisor at Leo Burnett USA.
- 1971: Became senior VP-marketing for Kentucky Fried Chicken.
- 1977: Named chairman of KFC.
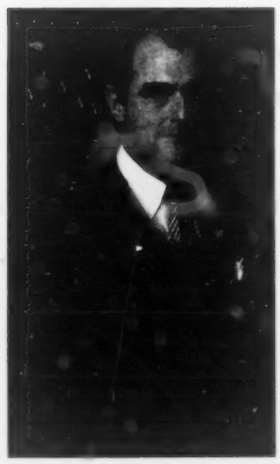
- 1980: Named senior VP of Heublein, KFC's parent, while keeping KFC title.
- 1982: Joined Kraft Inc. as president and chief operating officer.
- 1989: Named chairman-ceo of Kraft General Foods and vice chairman of Philip Morris Cos.
- 1991: Appointed chairman-ceo of Philip Morris, succeeding Hamish Maxwell.



By Judann Dagnoli

With Michael Miles as its leader, Philip Morris Cos. could conquer the food world.

Already the nation's largest food company and the No. 3 food marketer worldwide, Philip Morris is setting its sights on global expansion with last week's appointment of Mr. Miles as chairman-ceo.

Analysts expect Mr. Miles, 51, to use the company's enormous cash flow generated by its tobacco business to finance acquisitions and build an international food empire that could rival that of Nestle and Unilever.

In addition to Mr. Miles, now chairman-ceo at Philip Morris' Kraft General Foods, the company also announced that Philip Morris Vice Chairman William Murray, 55, will become president-chief operating officer of the parent company. Geoffrey Bible, 53, now president-chief administrative officer of Kraft General Foods, will assume the new post of exec VP-international to oversee Philip Morris' food and tobacco businesses outside North America. All appointments take effect in September.

The moves indicate an attempt by the company to strengthen its position as a food marketer worldwide while continuing its

Buick ads target ZIP codes

By Raymond Serafin and Cleveland Horton

Buick, with the help of McCann-Erickson Worldwide, will launch its new Roadmaster station wagon this month with a revolutionary magazine ad buy targeted at specific ZIP codes.

Magazines have previously offered demographic and geographic buys, as well as ink-jet printing, for personalizing messages. But the Buick program is unusual because it represents a marketer and its agency coming up with their own target list.

"I'm not aware of anyone who's ever done it this way," said Karen Ritchie, senior VP-director of media services in McCann's Troy, Mich., office.

Starting in issues being delivered the week of April 15, the ads will run in Time, Newsweek, U.S. News & World Report, People, Sports Illustrated, Entertainment Weekly and Money.

The Buick program is unusual because it represents a marketer and its agency coming up with their own target list.

The targeted ads will run in issues going to 4,940 of the country's more than 40,000 ZIP codes, said Jay Qualman Jr., general director of advertising for the General Motors Corp. division.

Newsweek U.S. Publisher Peter Eldredge said the GM buy was, to his knowledge, the first of its kind and predicted similar deals would be forthcoming.

"I think it's an exciting opportunity for Buick," he said. "Quite frankly, I see this kind of target marketing happening more in the future. It's a tool that helps advertisers reach their best sales prospects."

Ms. Ritchie said Buick has been the prime user of the agency's proprietary McMapping data-base program developed last year to explore lifestyle, demographic and media usage information about specific target audiences. McCann pulled together information from several data bases and the U.S. Census Bureau to develop its program. It's never been used for a magazine ad before.

In the case of the Roadmaster launch, Buick wanted to reach households that would be

Michelob enlists in draft battle

By Ira Teinowitz

Anheuser-Busch will take direct aim at Miller Brewing Co.'s Miller Genuine Draft by using similar marketing imagery to introduce Michelob Golden Draft.

The battle begins April 15 when A-B starts testing Michelob Golden Draft and Michelob Golden Draft Light in six markets. Packaging, parts of the advertising, and pricing for the two new brews resemble those for Miller Genuine Draft and Genuine Draft Light.

The new Michelobs will come in clear bottles, like Genuine Draft, and bear similar black and gold labels. Even the bar call, "MGD," which Miller has used in promotions, is the same.

Miller's campaign from Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York, is themed "Get out of the old, get into the cold." Theme for four 30-second TV spots in A-B's introductory test campaign via DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, is "Capture the pure cold."

The new Michelob brands are "cold-filtered," just like Genuine Draft, and some TV spots show a beer barrel made of ice being tapped, a signature image in Miller Genuine Draft's TV spots.

In launching the new brews, A-B

DDB Needham 'results' plan draws yawns

By Gary Levin

NEW YORK—DDB Needham Worldwide's "guaranteed results" compensation plan may be a guaranteed failure so far.

An Advertising Age survey of DDB Needham's 25 major U.S.-based clients revealed none has signed up for the unusual plan, which bases client payment to the agency on whether specified sales or other performance goals are met.

The plan, a brainchild of Chairman-CEO Keith Reinhard, was unveiled with great fanfare last May at a press breakfast attended by more than 200 at the posh Four Seasons restaurant.

K. Reinhard

Major clients who say they declined to participate in the plan include Anheuser-Busch Cos., General Mills, H.J. Heinz Co., Hershey Foods Corp., Mobil Oil Corp., McDonald's Corp., Ralston Purina Co. and Jos. E. Seagram & Sons.

American Airlines and S.C. Johnson & Son, both of whom DDB Needham works for only outside the U.S., also said they aren't participating in the guaranteed-results plan.

When DDB Needham announced the plan, the agency promised it would sign up 10 clients by January.

In a recent interview with Ad Age, Mr. Reinhard maintained the agency has five signed agreements in the U.S. and six more overseas that are either "directly or along the lines of the guaranteed-results plan."

The plan was "very instrumental" in five new clients' decisions to hire the agency, he said, though he acknowledged none of those clients signed up for the program.

Mr. Reinhard refused to identify any of the clients.

Many industry observers say that wrinkles in the plan—including a demand that the agency control the "consis-

Change bowls over cereal marketers

New-product intros, ad spending waning

By Julie Liesse

The food industry's perennial star category has lost its luster.

Sales volume of ready-to-eat cereals fell 1% last year for the first time in more than a decade. And now cereal marketers concede the era of heavy ad spending may be over.

That's not all that's changing. The six big cereal companies are grappling to redefine marketing rules in an environment where new products have little impact, private labels are the most dreaded competitor and market share is no longer worth virtually any price.

Has the cereal industry hit a no-growth plateau? No, Steve Sanger, president of General Mills' cereal division, told food analysts last month.

"This is not a zero-growth market," agreed Quaker Oats Co. Chairman-CEO William Smithburg.

Nevertheless, unit volume growth predictions range from 1% to 4%, a far cry from the 1980s' annual increases of 5% or more. And that portends change.

"I view Basic 4 and Triples and Cinnamon Mini Buns [the three newest cereal brands] as the last gasp of the old template, the last of the old style of executing new products . . . with $35 million marketing budgets and positioned as the second coming," said Polly Kawalek, director of marketing for new cereals at Quaker.

Traditionally, new products with big ad campaigns have driven the category. Measured media spending alone likely was close to $900 million in 1990 and totaled $839 million in 1989. In a category where 1 share point is worth $72 million, there's always been plenty of incentive to invest in new products.

But some now say the category is saturated, with 220 different products and few if any consumer desires unaddressed.

Only 31 of the 220 brands sold today have shares of 1% or better, the same number as in 1985, when there were just 145 brands, General Mills' Mr. Sanger said.

Defusing the link to Iraq

Hachette studies charges as advertisers hold firm

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—Hachette Magazines executives moved quickly last week to minimize fallout from a report charging Iraqi President Saddam Hussein indirectly owns a sizable stake in its French parent.

Paris-based media giant Hachette SA publishes 15 consumer magazines in the U.S., including Elle, Woman's Day, Road & Track, Car & Driver and Stereo Review.

The publishers of those magazines placed emergency calls to their top advertisers last week, reassuring them that Hachette is taking steps to explore the matter.

At press time, no advertiser had canceled or suspended schedules, said Exec VP-Publishing David Pecker.

"Other than a lot of jokes, I think advertisers are sophisticated," he said. "They realize that you can't control who buys your stock."

"Typically, we don't put ownership pro or con in the mix when we evaluate a magazine. But these are special circumstances."

Saddam Hussein's alleged financial link to Hachette was revealed in a segment on CBS-TV's "60 Minutes" broadcast March 24. The report charged that Montana Management, a Geneva-based company that controls 8.4% of Hachette and is its second largest shareholder, is a front for investors acting on behalf of the Iraqi government.

Less than 48 hours after the report, Hachette said in a statement from Paris that it had launched an investigation to "determine the identities of Montana Management's shareholders."

If it could establish an Iraqi connection to Montana, Hachette said, it would "ask the appropriate authorities to enforce the U.N. resolutions regarding the freeze of Iraqi assets" and try to acquire Montana's shares.

In a previous statement, Hachette stressed Montana "never had any influence at any time over Hachette since they have

Midway filing is blow to CME

Reorganization petition shows troubled airline owes shop $1.8M

By Ira Teinowitz

Midway Airlines' filing for Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization is a $1.8 million headache for Campbell-Mithun-Esty, Chicago, listed as one of the airline's unsecured creditors.

The money represents a combination of production and media placement fees, most of it for media placement, said CME President Marv Goldsmith.

He said not all the media had been paid yet by CME, and its lawyers are looking closely at the agency's media contracts to determine liability. He wouldn't estimate the amount still unpaid.

"Any liability is significant as far as CME is concerned," Mr. Goldsmith said.

Still, CME officials said they will keep serving Midway and hoped the tab eventually would get paid. A meeting of the airline's creditors is set for this week.

"Our financial arrangements going forward are satisfactory, and we will continue to place media and execute production in support of Midway's marketing and advertising programs," Mr. Goldsmith said in a memo to agency staffers. He didn't further outline the arrangements, which may call for Midway to pay upfront for future media placement.

CME's contracts with media reportedly are the standard ones in the industry and say little about Chapter 11 filings. The American Association of Advertising Agencies recently recommended agencies limit their liability to media bills already paid to them by the client.

"We will continue to place media and execute production in support of Midway's marketing and advertising programs."

CME is at least the fourth agency to be hit with a hefty bill recently as a result of Chapter 11 filings.

In February, Carter Hawley Hale Stores' petition said it owed Cole & Weber, Seattle, $3.5 million. In January, G. Heileman Brewing Co.'s petition listed $563,754 owed to Della Femina, McNamee, New York. Continental Airlines' December petition said Wells, Rich, Greene was owed $7 million.

Recession slows Honda's parade

By Cleveland Horton

The shine may be off American Honda Motor Co.

For years, the Japanese auto marketer has been recession-proof and able to avoid the rebate jungle that plagues U.S. carmakers.

But recently Honda did the unthinkable: The marketer increased incentives, slowed production and began storing inventory.

While all these actions are common for other car marketers, they're a revolutionary act for Honda, with sales that characteristically outperform the industry.

Honda's recent actions are raising questions about the future of Japanese car companies.

For almost 15 years, sales of these cars in the U.S. have risen steadily, regardless of the industry's overall state. But as consumer confidence crashed and patriotism revved up during the Persian Gulf War, there have been questions about the importers' continued growth.

"We're in the same soup as everyone else," said Eric Conn, Honda's senior advertising manager.

Honda executives, however, bristle at suggestions that its recession tactics are nearly as drastic as those of competitors. Honda's $900 per car incentive, for example, is directed at dealers and not advertised. Likewise, cutting production by 5,000 cars at two Ohio factories represents just 1.2% of the plants' 1990 output. And the well-documented 2,000 cars parked outside the factory represent only 1½ days' supply.

Curiously, the roots of Honda's mystique date back to the economic downturns of the late 1970s and early 1980s. During those tough times, the marketplace turned in droves to the Japanese alternative.

"In the past, what the Japanese had to offer were small, fuel-efficient cars that were less costly, both to buy and to maintain," said Cynthia Certo, director of forecasting at Integrated Automotive Resources, a research company. "That's no longer true. They have all moved way up [in price and size], and now they're facing the same factors that are hurting the domestics."

Both previous recessions were accompanied by higher gas prices and scarce supplies. Those factors sent consumers pouring into import dealerships for high-mileage, low-price small cars.

Honda ads have poked fun at the "wayward" competition, but consumer attitudes may be changing.

This time, however, the price of gas hasn't increased significantly. And, further, few cars—domestic or imported—can boast any significant fuel efficiency advantage.

Honda doesn't plan any revolution in its award-winning, generally understated advertising. But Mr. Conn said he expects the 1992 campaign, breaking in the fall, to be "a little more direct, a little more informative with more of a call to action. For us, that's pretty tough stuff."

Rubin Postaer & Associates, Los Angeles, handles the estimated $175 million Honda account.

With a down economy, Honda may also be hurt by its premium pricing strategy.

"People now are willing to give up quality for price," said Ronald Glantz, an industry analyst who's senior VP at Dean Witter Financial Services Group.

"Aggressive pricing will be one of the biggest factors in coming years," Ms. Certo said. Although rebates "will probably be around forever," she said, they won't necessarily stimulate sales.

Also, as a market leader, Honda is now more subject to attack by other companies.

For example, General Motors Corp.'s Buick division recently aired a spot that makes no bones about its desire to unseat Honda.

Honda's award-winning "Art Gallery" spot showed an Accord hanging on a gallery wall, then being driven away. In the Buick commercial (AA, Feb. 25), a driver gets out of a Toyota Camry (that looks like an Accord) hanging on a wall and walks over to a Regal.

Toyota Motor Sales USA and Nissan Motor Corp. USA are training their sights on Honda but in different ways. Toyota's Camry goes head-to-head with the Accord, while Nissan positions its vehicles in areas where Honda isn't as strong. For example, in the low end of the import market, the Nissan Sentra has a price advantage over the Honda Civic.

Neither attacks the Japanese import leader in ads directly, but both are more willing than Honda to run retail ads and use consumer rebates.

For its part, Honda is looking toward the fall, when it will introduce redesigned versions of its Prelude and Civic models. For the second-tier marketers, including relative newcomer Daihatsu Motors of America and long-troubled Suzuki of America Corp., hanging on until the fall poses a challenge for their dealers.

Observers like to credit Japanese companies for their ability to sacrifice quarterly earnings for long-term market share gains. However, North America may no longer be as attractive for future profits.

"These days, when you take your lumps, it's no longer certain that you'll be profitable in five years," said Jesse Snyder, director-product analysis for AutoPacific Group. □

Ally, Dougherty, Bloom enter Hall

NEW YORK—Ad executives Carl Ally and the late Sam Bloom, along with Phil Dougherty, the late ad columnist for The New York Times, were inducted into the Advertising Hall of Fame last week.

Mr. Ally, former chairman of Ally & Gargano and founder-ceo of Carl Ally Inc., was cited for his former agency's breakthrough creative work for clients including Volvo Cars of North America, Hertz Corp. and Federal Express Corp.

Mr. Bloom founded the Bloom Agency in Dallas in 1952 after a 32-year career in newspaper publishing. The agency grew steadily, expanded out of Texas and was recently bought by FCA, Paris, and renamed Bloom FCA. Mr. Bloom died in 1983.

Mr. Dougherty covered the ad industry for the Times for 22 years. He died in September 1988.

Mr. Ally was on hand to accept the award. Mr. Bloom's son Bob, chairman-ceo of Bloom FCA, and other family members accepted Mr. Bloom's award, while Mr. Dougherty's wife, Pat, accepted the award for her husband. □

Outdoor spending slips in '90

By Alison Fahey

Spending on outdoor advertising showed its biggest decline in at least a decade last year, according to new figures from LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service.

Industry experts were quick to blame the drop on overall economic turmoil, the Persian Gulf War and the influence of special-interest groups.

Overall ad spending dropped 2.4% to $688.8 million in 1990, LNA reported.

"It was a tough paper route out there last year," said Tommy Teepell, senior VP of the Institute of Outdoor Advertising.

But he contended LNA figures are under-reported and ad spending probably stayed flat, rather than declined. The IOA is conducting a third-party audit, but it hasn't been completed.

Patrick Media Group, the nation's largest outdoor company, had a 1% decline in ad spending in 1990, said Tom Donohue, director of marketing services.

"The three categories that we took a hit with were the [local] radio business, car dealers and tobacco," Mr. Donohue said, noting a loss of about $3 million in tobacco spending in 1990.

The cuts "mirror what was going on with our economy," he said.

Spending declined in eight of the top 10 outdoor categories, with the biggest slashes coming from the publishing and media category (22.5%) and automotive (11.2%), LNA reported.

"In 1990, there was not a substantial increase in out-of-home from our agency vs. 1989," said Helen Giles, VP for out-of-home media at Lintas:Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich., the agency of record for Chevrolet. "I would say it was pretty flat."

LNA also reported cutbacks in 1990 spending from tobacco advertisers (2.8%) and alcohol-related marketers (1.6%), whose inner-city boards came under fire from special-interest groups concerned that the advertisers were unfairly targeting youths and minorities.

In response, the Outdoor Advertising Association of America in 1990 instituted a "code of advertising" policy encouraging its member companies to place decals on boards in certain areas to identify them as permanently off-limits to tobacco- and alcohol-related ads.

That voluntary policy will likely result in a continued loss of spending from tobacco and liquor marketers.

The two biggest outdoor companies, Patrick and Gannett Outdoor Group, have tagged more than 8,200 board faces between them, said Roland McElroy, OAAA president.

"Let's face it, outdoor is still not a primary buy," said one agency media executive who asked not to be identified. "But more importantly, some of the [medium's] biggest categories, like retail, had problems of their own."

Gannett, which sells ad space on transit shelters as well as outdoor boards, said it bucked the soft environment and had overall ad spending increases of 5% in 1990.

That growth was due, in part, to an infusion of some $2 million last year in the company's marketing group that went to hiring more personnel and installing computer systems used as marketing tools, said James Keller, VP-marketing.

For 1991, at least the first half of the year, the outdoor advertising industry may still have to weather tough times as some of its biggest spenders continue to cope with internal troubles.

For example, the publishing and media category, in a slump for more than a year, doesn't expect a turnaround in business until later this year or possibly early 1992.

And many retailers, for example, who took a blow during the crucial holiday selling season, have indicated their ad spending would continue to stay flat, or decline, until at least mid-1991.

In the automotive category, most ad spending hinges on automotive sales, which have been sliding.

At Lintas, Ms. Giles said the agency has already canceled some outdoor buys for Chevrolet for early 1991 due to slow car sales.

"I was more optimistic for 1991, but things turned around," she said, noting that even with the cuts, the agency's outdoor spending for automotive may be up slightly over 1990.

"We thought it was going to be a good year and then car sales really went down, and of course, our budgets were affected by that," she said.

But some outdoor company executives were more upbeat.

"Most companies are having a strong first quarter," the IOA's Mr. Teepell said.

Patrick's Mr. Donohue agreed.

"As a company we're doing extremely well," he said. "We've put an emphasis on the package-goods area and had great success with that."

Patrick also said that the entertainment industry, in particular movie studios, was spending more.

"1991 is a year of opportunity for the out-of-home industry," Gannett's Mr. Keller said. "Advertisers can no longer continue to think traditional media." □

Cola feeding frenzy

Pepsi ad challenges Coke's restaurant tactics

By Alison Fahey and Scott Hume

Pepsi-Cola Co. is regaining ground on Coca-Cola in their war over the restaurant market.

The battle waged in trade ads and restaurants promises to get rougher before the fizz is gone, industry observers say.

Pepsi last week announced it signed with Franchise Associates, South Weymouth, Mass., franchisor of the 120-unit Howard Johnson's Restaurants, a Coke client for 15 years.

That conquest is the latest of several for Pepsi as it wages an aggressive campaign to discredit Coca-Cola by alleging Coke is giving preferential treatment to McDonald's Corp. at the expense of its other restaurant clients.

Pepsi's three-page ad ran in February and March in Nation's Restaurant News and claimed "Coke classifies its restaurant accounts into two distinct categories."

In one category, Pepsi says, are Burger King Corp.; General Mills' Red Lobster USA and Olive Garden; Hardee's Food Systems; Popeyes Famous Fried Chicken & Biscuits; Rax Restaurants; and Wendy's International. The second category is just McDonald's.

The difference, Pepsi's ad alleges, is that "this year, while Coke required national accounts like you to absorb a per-gallon price increase, we hear there was no change to McDonald's net price. In effect, Coke's pricing policy is requiring you to subsidize the operations of your largest competitor. Which means this competitor has even more dollars to pour into its fight for share of customers."

Pepsi's divide-and-conquer tactic is the same one Coca-Cola has used successfully in the past.

Pepsi's ad was dismissed as "just part of the cola wars" by Wendy's VP-Communications Dennis Lynch. "We feel we're getting excellent treatment by Coca-Cola."

But Coca-Cola reacted strongly. "The Pepsi claims are total fabrication," said Randy Donaldson, a Coca-Cola spokesman. "They are absolutely false, and we are planning to respond accordingly."

He wouldn't elaborate.

But Pepsi's divide-and-conquer tactic is the same one Coca-Cola has used successfully in the past. After PepsiCo bought Kentucky Fried Chicken Corp. in 1986, giving it, with Taco Bell and Pizza Hut, ownership of three of the 10 largest fast-food chains, Coca-Cola trade ads argued restaurants were subsidizing rivals.

The tactic worked: Last year, Burger King and Wendy's switched to Coca-Cola from Pepsi.

But Pepsi has refused to give up. It's signed up Marriott Corp., Metromedia Steakhouses, which operates the Ponderosa Steakhouses and Bonanza Family Restaurants chains, the National Amusements theater chain and Norwegian Cruise Line.

Pepsi now holds a 26.3% share of fountain sales, said Jesse Meyers, editor of Beverage Digest. Coca-Cola's share is 59.7%. Pepsi has regained, at Coca-Cola's expense, the share it had before last year's Burger King loss dropped it to about 21% (vs. Coca-Cola's 65%).

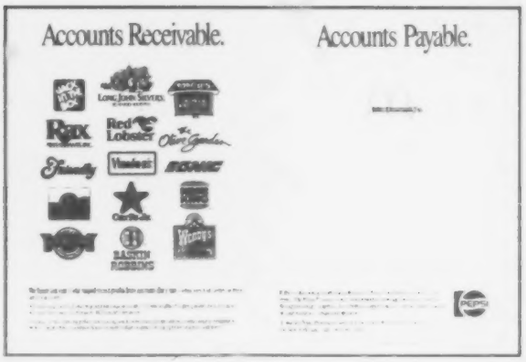
Marriott's shift last month, according to an internal Coca-Cola memo leaked to Atlanta newspapers, followed Coca-Cola's refusal to lend Marriott $50 million to $100 million. The memo reportedly suggests Pepsi may have offered such a deal to win the business.

"Coke's letter is grossly inaccurate and bad form," said Gary Gerdemann, manager of public relations for Pepsi. "[Our] agreement with Marriott is based on product, equipment and services. . . . We would not violate any legal or ethical contract standards."

Pepsi will keep running the anti-Coca-Cola ad, created by Tracy-Locke, Dallas, and will stay aggressive, Mr. Gerdemann said.

"We've run ads directed to the restaurant trade before and they've been competitive," he said. "The fountain business is gruelingly competitive, so the advertising would reflect that."

"The cola wars have moved into the on-premise trenches," Mr. Meyers said. "I suspect we'll see a lot more of this" kind of advertising from both companies. □



Pepsi-Cola may have won some business with its trade ad: It signed Howard Johnson Restaurants, a 15-year Coca-Cola client.

- Oscar Mayer Foods Corp. will use its sponsorship of the U.S. Olympic Team as a focus for a multidimensional marketing program, including Olympic-themed advertising; Olympic rings on Oscar Mayer labels; free standing inserts; and local event sponsorship. Oscar Mayer also will "pay" for part of its sponsorship by supplying training centers with its Oscar Mayer, Louis Rich, Louis Kemp and Claussen products. "This is the biggest marketing event we've ever done," said Steve Ligouri, VP-marketing, established brands. Olympic ad campaigns for Louis Rich and Oscar Mayer are scheduled to break in the second half of the year. J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago, handles Oscar Mayer products; D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, handles Louis Rich brands. Frankel & Co., Chicago, is promotion agency for Oscar Mayer Foods Corp.
- Dreyer's Grand Ice Cream today breaks a $10 million spot TV campaign in 14 markets. Humorous spots feature individual flavors with the tag "It's not your normal French Vanilla" (or whichever flavor is featured). Goldberg Moser O'Neill, San Francisco, handles.
- Nestle Chocolate & Confections Co. is featuring golfer Chi Chi Rodriquez in its new "S-Crunch-ous" campaign for Nestle Crunch bars. The spot breaks nationally today via Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor, New York.

- Adobe Systems, Mountain View, Calif., narrowed its $3 million to $5 million software account review to Foote, Cone & Belding; Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein; and Tallant LaPointe & Partners, all San Francisco. Former agency HL&S Partners, Mountain View, closed last month.
- Subway Sandwiches, Milford, Conn., narrowed its review to 12 shops and plans to hear presentations from a selected three late this month. Beber Silverstein & Partners, Miami, resigned the approximately $2 million creative assignment in February. Subway buys media.
- Superior Rent-A-Car, Orlando, Fla., to Leighton/Brydger, Fort Lauderdale, first agency for its $4.5 million account. Spot TV and print are slated to break in May.
- Roman Meal Co., Tacoma, Wash., to Grey Advertising, Los Angeles, from McCann-Erickson, Seattle, for its $4 million account.
- A.T. Cross Co., Lincoln, R.I., to Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston, from Potter Hazlehurst, E. Greenwich, R.I., for its estimated $4 million writing instruments account.
- Venture Stores, St. Louis, to Bloom FCA, Dallas, first agency for the retailer's estimated $3 million account.
- Washington Mutual, Seattle, to McCann-Erickson from Evans/Kraft for the federal savings bank's $3 million to $5 million account. Evans/Kraft in February resigned the account after 49 years to take on the estimated $5 million account of Seafirst.

Spreadsheet battle looms

By Bradley Johnson and Alan Radding

The success of Microsoft Corp.'s Windows, a software package that makes personal computers easier to use, is opening the way for the biggest shake-up in the software market since the early 1980s.

The battle begins this summer in the second largest software category as the three top vendors of spreadsheet programs determine who's going to take the lead in the '90s.

Windows, which gives IBM-compatible PCs many of the "mouse"-operated features of Apple Computer's Macintosh, is generating reactions from all fronts.

The Federal Trade Commission is investigating whether Microsoft has behaved fairly in marketing Windows. The FTC is probing whether Microsoft misled rivals about Windows' potential in an effort to gain an unfair advantage for its products using the operating system.

Apple last month issued a study claiming Macintosh offers a price/performance value superior to Windows. IBM Corp. is pushing OS/2 as an alternative to Windows.

But Windows quickly is becoming the industry standard, with software vendors scrambling to make their products compatible with it. Hence the coming battle over spreadsheets.

Microsoft, the No. 1 vendor of PC software, has the most to gain. Best known for creating Windows and other operating systems—the invisible software that allows computers to run other programs—Microsoft is an up-and-comer in applications software such as spreadsheets and word processing.

The company with the most to lose is No. 2 software vendor Lotus Development Corp., whose Lotus 1-2-3 has been the dominant spreadsheet since 1983. Lotus will be launching a Windows-based Lotus 1-2-3 this summer to regain slipping market share.

Because Microsoft has been selling Windows-based spreadsheets for three years, "Lotus is going to be in the unusual position of [chasing] a market leader," said Marshall Moseley, software analyst at Dataquest, a market research company. There's "a distinct possibility" that Lotus will slip from the top when the Windows market opens fully in the mid-1990s.

Taking on both companies will be Borland International, the feistiest and fastest-growing major spreadsheet marketer, which will release a Windows-based version of its hot-selling Quattro Pro later in the year.

"As the Windows spreadsheet market explodes, it will be wide open," said Peter Horan, senior VP-account group director at Microsoft's agency, Ogilvy & Mather, Los Angeles. "The momentum is going to be folks coming in and buying their first Windows applications. We are all going to be out there shouting to them."

The battle will be fought through ads in business and computer titles including Lotus, spun off by Lotus Development in January.

But more critical than paid media may be direct mail, seminars for current spreadsheet users, aggressive pricing strategies on upgrades and public relations.

"Advertising is not the end-all of what drives sales," said Stephen Kahn, Borland's VP-general manager for spreadsheets.

Borland, handling advertising in-house, bashes Lotus constantly in ads. Mr. Kahn refused to discuss marketing strategies for the Windows-based Quattro Pro due later this year, but Borland likely will keep up its attack.

Lotus since fall has focused ads on the latest version of 1-2-3 while scrambling to develop Windows software. A major ad campaign is being planned for the expected introduction of 1-2-3 for Windows this summer, said Laurie Phelan, Lotus ad manager. Other ads will support a version of 1-2-3 for the Macintosh later this year. Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston, handles.

The campaigns will support Lotus' declared strategy of having a version of 1-2-3 for every computer and operating system.

Microsoft is trying to secure Excel's position before others move in. Launch ads for the latest rendition, Excel 3.0, broke in January in business and computer publications. An eight-page brochure explaining Windows ran last month in The Wall Street Journal, Business Week and newsweeklies. Microsoft is plotting its strategy for the second half.

The three companies command 75% of unit sales in spreadsheets, with smaller brands carving up the rest, Dataquest said. With North American sales last year of $701.3 million, spreadsheets represent the second largest category, behind word processors, in the $4.6 billion software applications market, Software Publishers Association said. □

Titles dance with Costner

By Janice Kelly

Cover Story is a monthly ranking of celebrities' popularity as reflected by their appearances on more than 30 leading U.S. publications.

Magazine editors went on a spring cleaning spree in March, packing away last year's overexposed faces and introducing a new lineup of hot celebs.

Actor-director Kevin Costner scored 12.5 points in the Cover Story survey to capture first place.

It was his first appearance since he tied with Donald Trump for eighth place in December.

The survey assigns point values to cover appearances based on such factors as prominence of the photo and frequency of the publication.

The focus was on Mr. Costner for his movie, "Dances With Wolves." The film went on to win seven Oscars, including best director for Mr. Costner.

Gracing at least two covers already in April, Mr. Costner may keep the crown another month.

Kevin Costner has won more than his Oscars.

Magazine editors also devoted substantial cover space to Jodie Foster, hyping her latest psychothriller, "The Silence of the Lambs." She finished second with 9.5 points.

Third place went to President Bush with 8 points. Most of his coverage focused on the allied victory over Iraq.

Tied for fourth with 6 points were the Duchess of York, due to rumors of a troubled marriage, and Whoopi Goldberg, for publicity preceding her Oscar as best supporting actress for the movie "Ghost."

Robert DeNiro and Val Kilmer tied for sixth with 5 points each. Mr. DeNiro, nominated for an Oscar for "Awakenings," stars in the new film "Guilty by Suspicion." Mr. Kilmer has received much attention for his role as Jim Morrison in the movie "The Doors."

Sharing eighth with 4 points each were Julia Roberts, the "Pretty Woman" star whose latest movie is "Sleeping With the Enemy"; Vanna White; Oprah Winfrey; Kirk Douglas, who was injured in an airplane crash; and Tammy and Jim Bakker, who are opening a new ministry.

The top four 1990 Cover Story finishers—Madonna, Elizabeth Taylor, Donald Trump and Saddam Hussein—were hard to find on March covers. □

Radio listeners are tuning out Top 40 and tuning in country and news/talk stations, according to a fall 1990 study by Arbitron Co. and Billboard.

One reason for the boost in news/talk listenership was concern about the escalating Persian Gulf crisis, said Sean Ross, Billboard radio editor.

Country radio program directors credited the rise in that format's popularity to increased national media coverage and the appeal of younger country artists, Billboard reported.

Adult contemporary stations continued to earn the biggest audience among listeners 12 and older in the top 76 markets. Top 40 and adult standards were the only formats in the top 10 to lose share since fall 1989.

Top 40 may be on a slide because stations are playing less variety, making it hard to reach adults and teens, Mr. Ross said.

The survey is based on national Arbitron diary entries from Sept. 22 to Dec. 12. □

Favorite formats in radio

Listeners in the top 76 markets have touched that dial. Here is each format's quarterly share of listeners 12-plus.

Format	Fall '89	Fall '90	Format	Fall '89	Fall '90
Adult contemporary	17.0%	18.6%	Classic rock	3.3	3.7
News/talk	12.6	13.0	Adult standards	3.4	3.1
Top 40	14.5	12.8	Easy listening	6.5	2.9

OUTLOOK: NETWORKS' FALL PLANS

Sizing up nets' nightly strategies

The four networks recently presented their 1991-92 prime-time program development meetings to the advertising community. Bozell, New York, offers this night-by-night analysis of each network's strategy.

Monday: With little growth potential in the 8-9 p.m. (ET) slot, ABC may replace "MacGyver." "Monday Night Football" will continue at 9-11 p.m. CBS appears happy with its 8-10 p.m. comedies—"Evening Shade," "Major Dad," "Murphy Brown" and "Designing Women"—but may put a new show in the 10 p.m. slot if its April trial run of "Northern Exposure" doesn't work. NBC is looking for a companion show at 8:30 p.m. to follow "Fresh Prince of Bel Air." Fox will return with an 8-10 p.m. movie package of made-for-TV and theatrical films.

Tuesday: "Who's the Boss?" (8 p.m.) and "Roseanne" (9 p.m.) are the only sure hits to return on ABC's schedule next year. "Coach" (9:30 p.m.), "Davis Rules" (8:30 p.m.) and "thirtysomething" (10 p.m.) are questionable. CBS will stick with its low-cost "Rescue 911" (8-9 p.m.) and its 9-11 p.m. movie lineup. NBC is looking for an action-adventure hour at 8 p.m.; "In the Heat of the Night" and "Law & Order" will return from 9-11 p.m. Fox won't program Tuesday nights.

Wednesday: "The Wonder Years" (8 p.m.) and "Doogie Howser, M.D." (9 p.m.) will return on ABC, but the network may cancel "Growing Pains" (8:30 p.m.), "Anything But Love" (9:30 p.m.) and "Equal Justice" (10 p.m.). CBS is seeking a succession of comedies; its current 8-11 p.m. lineup of "48 Hours," "Jake & the Fatman" and "WIOU" are "borderline." NBC is looking for a show to follow "Unsolved Mysteries" (8-9 p.m.) and will probably keep "Quantum Leap" in its 10-11 p.m. slot. Fox won't program Wednesday nights.

Gary's already gone . . . will the rest of "thirtysomething's" cast follow?

Thursday: ABC may replace its 8-10 p.m. lineup of "Father Dowling" and "Gabriel's Fire," but "PrimeTime Live" likely will return at 10 p.m. CBS will probably reprogram 8-10 p.m., now slated with "Top Cops" and "Antagonists," but will keep "Knots Landing" at 10 p.m. NBC is expected to return with "The Cosby Show," "A Different World" and "Cheers" from 8-9:30 p.m. and will schedule either "Wings" or "Seinfeld" at 9:30 with "L.A. Law" returning at 10 p.m. "The Simpsons" will return at 8 p.m. on Fox, but "Babes" likely will be replaced at 8:30. One possibility to replace it is "Beverly Hills 90210."

Friday: "Full House" and "Family Matters" likely will return from 8-9 p.m. and "20/20" at 10 p.m. on ABC, but "Perfect Strangers" and "Baby Talk" are "iffy" from 9-10 p.m. CBS will try to regain Friday night but may have to move "Dallas" to 10 p.m. with a new lineup from 8-10 p.m. NBC will completely overhaul Friday night and go after adults 18-49. "America's Most Wanted" will return on Fox from 8-9 p.m.; Fox has a number of series in development for 9-10 p.m.

Saturday: In an attempt to attract young adults, ABC is developing several shows including a project with MTV: Music Television, and likely will bring back "The Young Riders" at 8-9 p.m. CBS will completely revamp this night, possibly including a news or reality show. NBC will try new comedies at 8-9 p.m. leading into "Golden Girls" and "Empty Nest," and may move "Hunter" to 10 p.m. "Totally Hidden Video" (8 p.m.) and "Cops" (9 p.m.) should return on Fox, but it will probably put new shows in its 8:30 and 9:30 half-hours.

Sunday: "America's Funniest Home Videos," "America's Funniest People" and the Sunday movie will return on ABC from 8-11 p.m., but the network may pull "Life Goes On" at 7 p.m. CBS will stick with its lineup of "60 Minutes," "Murder, She Wrote" and the "CBS Sunday Movie." NBC is developing new series to reach adults 18-49 leading into its movie package at 9 p.m. Fox's "In Living Color," "Get a Life" and "Married . . . With Children" will return from 8-9:30 p.m., but Fox will revamp 7-8 p.m. and is considering "Top of the Heap" for 9:30 p.m. "Comic Strip Live" will probably return at 10 p.m. □

Agency Belding blues

ABC's 'Twin Peaks' ads snare big award

By Cleveland Horton

LOS ANGELES—Adding to the evidence that 1990 was a lackluster year for agencies, a TV network took top honors in southern California's most prestigious ad competition.

The Advertising Club of Los Angeles last week bestowed its Sweepstakes Belding award to ABC-TV for three promotional spots created in-house for the series "Twin Peaks."

The judges' decision marks the first time in the awards' 25-year history that a company, rather than an agency, has won the Sweepstakes Belding award.

The 11 judges "were tough this year," said John Hirschboeck, president of Team One, El Segundo, and chairman of the Belding Awards. "They awarded 40% fewer bowls."

While he characterized the decision as "enigmatic," he added, "What's being recognized is ideas, and they can come from the client, the direct mail house or anywhere."

The Belding move follows a decision by Advertising Age not to bestow Agency of the Year honors on any U.S. shop for the first time since it began giving the award in 1973.

ABC created the three award-winning spots, titled "Midget," "Coffee" and "Trickle Down," for the series' resumption last fall, when the question "Who killed Laura Palmer?" had yet to be answered.

"Twin Peaks" spawned a second award winner as well. GEM/Fattal & Collins, Santa Monica, earned a Belding bowl for a "Twin Peaks" promotion for KATU-TV, the Portland, Ore., ABC affiliate.

Three years ago, the Belding Awards generated some controversy when the judges selected a one-week promotional campaign for the Sweepstakes. The campaign, created by Della Femina, McNamee, promoted the Isuzu/-Kapulana International golf tournament and featured the car company's "Joe Isuzu" spokesman.

Chiat/Day/Mojo, Venice, last year's Sweepstakes winner, this time took home the most bowls—10—for its work for Eveready Battery Co., Dep Corp., Mitsubishi Electronics and Quaker State Minit-Lube.

Other multiple-bowl winners were: Rubin Postaer & Associates (3); Team One (3); GEM/Fattal & Collins (2); and Muse Cordero Chen (2).

The number of bowls awarded dropped to 31 this year from 57 a year ago. □

Cereal

had less impact—with the average share of a new product hitting 0.23% in 1989 and 0.18% in 1990. And that's with far fewer new products.

"If you look at new-product introductions in the 1980s, they accelerated through the decade—and peaked out in 1989, when we saw 32 new products, with the estimated cost of taking those national between $20 million and $30 million each," said Kellogg Co. Chairman-CEO William LaMothe.

"With brands ending up with [subpar] shares, companies can't get a return on that kind of investment," he said.

Mr. LaMothe sees a change in marketer attitudes toward new cereals.

"It's clear all of us have cut back on new-product introductions," he said. "Here, at least, there's also a lot more discussion about market testing. We're not rushing to go national with every product."

He said he expects only about 10 new cereal products this year, down a third from last year.

"Everyone who's tried to do more than equity extensions in the past year or two has had their nose broken," one senior agency executive said.

"How much longer are we going to be in this period of hiatus, with none of us able to launch or sustain a new product?" the agency executive asked.

Quaker's new Tiny Toons Adventures—a short-term licensed cereal—epitomizes one approach to the problem: a willingness to look for niche products in lieu of big national introductions.

Ralston's experience shows the potential value of such niche products. If General Mills is "the big guy with the momentum, we're the little guy with the momentum in this market," Chairman-CEO William Stiritz said.

Fueled by licensed cereal successes Batman and Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles, Ralston's pound volume share hit 7% at one point last year and was 6.2% for all of 1990, up from 5.6% in 1989. For the 12 weeks ended Jan. 31, the company's share was 6.8%.

The category's other new products likely will be line extensions.

Although the format may change, "new products will always be key in this category," Quaker's Mr. Smithburg said. "The cereal business is one of high frequency and low loyalty."

With new, long-awaited production capacity on line, General Mills will likely be the new-product leader this year. Its Triples and Basic 4 were introduced in half the country in February, each with $35 million in marketing support.

Those two products will be General Mills' proving ground. The No. 2 company has narrowed the market-share gap with Kellogg in the past two years.

However, the most recent short-term shares indicate Big G's share may have plateaued. After racking up a 24.3% share for calendar 1990, General Mills accounted for "New products will always be key in this category. The cereal business is one of high frequency and low loyalty."

22.7% of pound volume in the 12 weeks ended Jan. 31.

The good news for Big G is that its rivals seem wary of spending heavily to gain share.

"We'd love to boost our share but want to do it profitably," Mr. Smithburg said.

Kraft General Foods' Post division, which in 1990 gained share for the first time in a decade, is similarly low-key. "We're a distant No. 3 in ready-to-eat cereals, and we don't want to get delusions of grandeur," said Michael Miles, the company's chairman-ceo.

Post boosted its share to 11.5% for the 12-week period. Nabisco Brands' share fell to 3.4%.

Even Kellogg, which has the most at stake, sounds cautious about its plans to regain market share. The company's share stood at 37.7% for the 12-week period. It's no secret in the industry that Kellogg would like to be back at its traditional 40% level, a level it hasn't attained since 1988.

"We sense we've got [share] stabilization out there, and we hope soon we'll start to move forward," Mr. LaMothe said. "But every 10th of a share point is being fought over. Share is not worth any cost; there has to be some judgment there. . . .

"Our emotional position is that we're still leader in the industry and can't let our share slip away forever. It's certainly true that you can buy share over the short period, but that's not what we want. We want to return to our historical share but do it with good fundamental business programs—and we'll take it over time."

So far, these attitudes haven't brought cutbacks in advertising and promotions. Instead, comparative advertising has proliferated.

General Mills, for example, introduced one of its two new cereals with the line, "If you like [Kellogg's] Rice Krispies, try new Triples."

Kellogg's brands have been attacked by General Mills, Post and Quaker, but the leader didn't join in until last year. Then, ads compared Kellogg's Just Right with General Mills' Total.

"I feel that comparative advertising is a lazy way to sell your product," Mr. LaMothe said. "We've succumbed because we're going to be competitive, and in some cases, it's the appropriate approach. It disturbs me, but it's a jungle out there."

Price promotions have been particularly intense, with $1 coupons and buy-one-get-one-free offers abounding.

Marketers' eagerness to be competitive with private-label prices is one reason for the heavy couponing. Store brands are the fastest-growing factor in the market, with a 7% share (AA, March 4).

"Without that pressure from private label, you'd see a lot of this high level of advertising and promotional spending disappear," Quaker's Ms. Kawalek said.

"There is power in absolute price points—and when you're pushing $3 for 14 or 15 ounces of cereal, you've hit a price threshold that will make the consumer go from feeling good about buying cereal to feeling bad," she said. "And all of a sudden, private-label looks pretty good."

And though their marketing strategies are changing, the six cereal companies aren't likely to give up on the category.

"The category's growth in the '80s [when sales shot up to $7 billion from $2.3 billion] has only whetted the appetite of these companies to be more aggressive," said another agency executive. □

FOR THE RECORD

KELLOGG CO. has sued Texas Assistant Attorney General Stephen Gardner for slander. In a suit filed last week in Michigan state Circuit Court in Battle Creek, the company said it was slandered by a quote from Mr. Gardner published in The New York Times Feb. 27. The quote was: "Kellogg constantly lies about its products. I don't believe anything Kellogg tells me. They've lied to me too many times." Kellogg is seeking a public retraction, general compensatory damages of $10,000 and punitive damages. Mr. Gardner called the suit groundless. He and Kellogg have been at odds over advertising and labeling claims.

Benson & Hedges goes to Burnett

NEW YORK—Philip Morris USA has officially named Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, to replace Wells, Rich, Greene on its estimated $40 million to $50 million Benson & Hedges cigarette account (AA, Nov. 12, et seq.). The company said WRG still will handle some new products, and parent Philip Morris Cos. also gave Wells its $3 million cultural-affairs account, previously at Ogilvy & Mather. A new Benson & Hedges campaign from Burnett, themed "Quality time," began running this month in major magazines. Separately, Nintendo of America, Redmond, Wash., last week named Burnett to handle the $25 million introduction of its Super Nintendo Entertainment System, an advanced videogame console. Foote, Cone & Belding, San Francisco, keeps the original Nintendo system's $20 million account. And Burnett is considered a favorite to win much of Park Ridge, N.J.-based Sony Electronics Corp. of America's estimated $30 million consumer electronics account, now handled by several agencies.

P&G inks deal with 'People'

CINCINNATI—Procter & Gamble signed a one-year, $15 million to $20 million pact with People that could be expanded to include other magazines and properties in Time Warner's portfolio. The deal represents Time Warner's latest effort to secure a guaranteed share of shrinking ad budgets by offering aggressive discounts and access to its vast resources. McCann savors major Nestle win

By Bradley Johnson

Nestle USA consolidated its entire $250 million to $300 million media buying account at McCann-Erickson Worldwide in one of the biggest shifts in advertising history.

McCann will manage the account through a newly formed unit, Comcord Group, expected to be based in Los Angeles, close to Nestle USA's Glendale, Calif., headquarters. The move represents a dramatic shift in media buying to the West from the East Coast.

Nestle USA was formed Jan. 1 to manage the $7 billion U.S. food business of Swiss-based Nestle SA. Twelve of the agencies that handle creative or media for the U.S. company made pitches for parts or all of the media assignment.

Though McCann was expected to pick up some media buying, it was a surprise Nestle USA opted to consolidate its entire billings at one agency.

McCann's win represents a dramatic shift in media buying to the West Coast.

McCann's importance as a creative agency for Nestle has grown recently, the company said, and that was part of the reason for choosing it for media buying. The agency recently was named to handle advertising for a new Nestle SA/Coca-Cola Co. iced coffee venture and won the bulk of the Nestle Beverage Co. creative business.

Creative billings from Nestle have grown to more than $60 million this year from less than $5 million in 1988.

McCann's extensive U.S. office network also gave the agency an advantage, said Dick Curd, Nestle USA media affairs director. Though media buying is expected to be managed in Los Angeles, McCann's New York office will assist with the Purchase, N.Y.-based chocolate business while the San Francisco office will work with the nearby beverage unit.

The decision to go with one agency was affected by the company's intent to become a leader in multimedia buys that link print and broadcast

Sun makes TV splash

Computer marketer's blitz plugs workstations

By Bradley Johnson

Sunday was Sun day.

Sun Microsystems, the world leader in computer workstations but until now a stingy advertiser, made its TV debut yesterday, and it was some debut.

The marketer spent about $1.5 million on a one-day blitz, media buyers estimate, close to Sun's total spending last year in general-interest business publications. The company used more than 30 minutes of commercial time on the Big 3 networks and several cable channels in a teaser for a three-month print campaign that begins today with an eight-page insert in The Wall Street Journal.

Sun's 30-second spot ran 61 times on ABC, CBS, NBC, Cable News Network, ESPN and the Arts & Entertainment network. The broadcast buy included morning news shows, sports and prime-time programming; the commercial ran during baseball coverage on ESPN and all day on CNN and A&E.

The campaign is a "multimillion-dollar" worldwide effort with a "significantly" increased ad budget, said Marty Brandt, Sun's group manager of advertising and direct marketing. The company spent an estimated $4.6 million in the U.S. last year, exclusively on computer and general-interest business publications.

H2O marketers mop damage

By Alison Fahey and Steven W. Colford

The $2.7 billion bottled water industry, stung last week by a scathing congressional report questioning purity claims, rushed to assess and limit the damage.

The International Bottled Water Association last week broke the first installment of a 10-month cable TV campaign created in-house, said William Deal, exec VP of the trade group.

The spot, scheduled before the flap, was originally supposed to be an image campaign for the industry. But it was revised at the last minute to focus on regulations that make bottled water "a safe consumer product," said Geary Campbell, manager-public relations of the association.

Future spots will address such industrywide issues as water sources, labeling and different uses, Ms. Campbell said.

The change was made before a

"The credibility of the whole industry is being called into question."

House Energy & Commerce subcommittee issued a report at a hearing last week charging some bottled water is no safer than tap water. The report didn't mention any specific marketers.

The uproar was triggered by a General Accounting Office report requested by Rep. John Dingell (D., Mich.), the committee's powerful chairman.

He called the Food & Drug Administration "inexcusably negligent and complacent" in its duty to regulate the industry. Consumers sometimes might pay "200 to 1,000 times more" for bottled water that "is often from the same source as their public water supply," he said.

Market observers agree the industry must act quickly to re-establish its credibility with consumers or face potentially serious damage.

"This is a blot on the industry itself, the credibility of the whole industry is being called into question," said

Sassy Publisher Bobbie Halfin holds a book she thinks will hit pay dirt in her hands.

PEOPLE TO WATCH

Bobbie Halfin doesn't mind getting her hands dirty.

In fact, her desk is covered with Dirt, the new teen male magazine to be launched this September as the alter ego of its distaff sibling, Sassy.

Although the recession—and the recent fits and failings of male-oriented publications such as Smart for Men and Men's Life—would seem to soil the outlook for another male magazine launch, Ms. Halfin and her team of California-based, twentysomething editors are certain they've hit pay dirt.

"The Dirt reader will be the same as a Sassy reader," says Ms. Halfin, exec VP-publisher of Sassy and publisher of Dirt.

Just because there has never been a magazine like Dirt doesn't mean an audience for it doesn't exist, Ms. Halfin says. About 15% of Sassy readers are male.

"We get letters from teen boys all the time asking us why there wasn't a Sassy for them," she says.

Teen males read a lot of magazines, like Playboy, Rolling Stone and Sports Illustrated, says Ms. Halfin, 44. But she says these magazines don't tell teens what to do about a case of acne or how to deal with peer pressure.

"These aren't things guys feel comfortable talking over with Dad or their friends," Ms. Halfin says. "It's the kind of issues that when you're 16 are the most important things in the world."

This kind of frank approach initially got Sassy, the impudent 4-year-old magazine, into hot water with advertisers. But Sassy's ad pages gradually have increased. First-quarter ad pages in the Lang Communications publication were up 35% from the same period in 1990, Ms. Halfin says.

Although Audit Bureau of Circulations reported Sassy's yearend 1990 circulation at 544,164, Ms. Halfin predicts its rate base will hit 650,000 this fall. Dirt, which initially will be published two to four times annually, will be distributed as a bonus issue of Sassy to attract its readers and their friends. Dirt also will be sold on newsstands in selected markets.

Besides traditional "guy" topics, such as skateboarding, music, fashion and sports, Dirt will feature humor and food, for example.

Although Dirt's ad rates have not yet been determined, "we've had good advertiser reaction," she says, "everyone from people in the grooming and fashion area, which we knew would do well, to entertainment advertisers and even soft-drink companies. Teen-age boys are big spenders in these areas."

Ms. Halfin thinks that by pursuing a different section of the men's market, Dirt can avoid the problems faced by recent new men's titles.

"While many have launched new men's magazines, no one has articulated something that was new in the men's field. In many ways they were rehashing Playboy without the nudity or Esquire in one of its many formats," Ms. Halfin says.

"I think the reason everyone is excited about Dirt is that this is truly unique in the men's area." □

Fast agency Grey Advertising, New York. He says copy in the spots is aimed at women.

These figures were selected because they're "believable, credible people," he says. "Our research shows women respond to that."

Thompson says men now comprise 25% of Slim-Fast's customer base, up from 19% in June 1989 when Mr. Lasorda's spot first broke. Although Mr. Stein credits the spots with expanding the product's appeal among men, "the weight-loss business is primarily targeted toward women," he says.

Heinz USA hasn't targeted men since a two-year campaign for its Heinz 57 steak sauce in 1984, says Mary Ann McCollough, general manager-marketing services.

"Efforts to target men have generally been few and far between," she says. "We see men as part of a family unity."

In addition, women still write the grocery list and choose brands more often.

Progressive Grocer's 1990 annual report on the supermarket business indicates female heads-of-household handle the primary grocery shopping in 70% of homes; male heads-of-household tackle the chore in 17% of homes.

"It appears women do more of the stock-up shopping, and men go out to the store for the fill-in trips," says Clay Collier, research director at Food Marketing Institute.

Even when men shop, in most cases the woman decides what package goods and cleaning products he should buy, says Susan Hayward, senior VP for Yankelovich Clancy Shulman's Monitor Group.

"I've been waiting for 10 years to see the change in men's attitudes everybody talks about, but our research hasn't seen any significant movement yet. Men still say women have the responsibility for deciding who eats what," she adds.

Even men's media realize they still have a big job ahead of them.

"I wouldn't expect people to bring beans into Playboy just yet," says Mr. Perlis. □

Trade spending tops

Media spending lowest since '78: Donnelley

By Michael Burgi

Marketers spent more on trade promotions in 1990 than any other promotional tool, a new survey showed.

Donnelley Marketing's "13th Annual Survey of Promotional Practices" found trade promotions garnered 44.3% of promotional budgets while media advertising accounted for 30.6% and consumer promotion represented 25.1%.

Trade promotion budgets were unchanged from '89, while consumer promotion was up slightly, from 25%, and media advertising fell slightly, from 30.7%.

In a continuing trend, spending levels for media advertising were the lowest since Donnelley began its survey in 1978, while trade and consumer promotional spending have shown regular increases.

The survey was conducted last fall and included 65 marketing executives from package-goods, health & beauty aids and household products companies. The survey questionnaires were mailed to 149 marketing executives based on the type of products marketed. Information was gathered from Sept. 10 to Oct. 30.

Couponing remained the most popular form of consumer promotions, with 95% saying they used couponing last year. Meanwhile, 88% of the respondents said they were using cents-off promotions while 75% said they used new-product sampling.

The survey also showed more than half of all marketers are using electronic couponing and kiosk coupons as well, a considerable surge from previous years.

Conversely, the survey showed marketers are moving away from consumer promotions, such as pre-priced shippers, money-back offers, cash refunds and premium offers, which have recorded a consistent decline in usage for the last five years.

The survey also examined the use of in-store consumer promotion compared with out-of-store efforts and showed that while marketers more frequently use out-of-store promotions (64%), in-store promotion has gained in share, to 36% last year from 20% in 1982. □

New Barq's effort has bite

By Christy Fisher

Barq's hopes to make its "The one with bite" tagline a hip phrase among teen boys.

The soft-drink marketer on May 5 breaks an estimated $4 million national cable and syndicated TV campaign on MTV: Music Television for its flagship root beer.

A "Metal Bites" cassette tape promotion accompanies the new campaign.

The irreverent campaign, which targets males ages 12 to 24, features the Poster Boys, a comedy trio billed as a modern-day Three Stooges.

The two 30-second spots cast the three in everyday, boring situations. One commercial shows the boys flipping through TV channels with a remote control and the other shows them sunning themselves on the back porch.

They react to situations by saying "This bites," "That bites," and "That really bites." But to their relief, Barq's doesn't bite, it's "the one with bite," reinforcing the product's longtime tagline. Radio supports.

Fred/Alan, New York, is the agency.

Consumers can get a cassette featuring heavy metal artists with three proof-of-purchase seals from 2-liter bottles or 12-packs of Barq's original or diet root beer. TV tags, local radio and point-of-purchase materials support; various agencies handle local media.

"In the past, our creative efforts have been typical of the industry—vignettes set to music of people drinking Barq's and enjoying themselves," said Rick Hill, Barq's VP-marketing. "We want to create an advertising campaign unique to our brand. . . . we want to create an attitude about Barq's."

Barq's is now available in about 70% of the U.S., excluding California, Oregon and Washington.

A&W Brands' A&W root beer is the market leader with a 30% share of supermarket case volume for its regular and diet flavors, Beverage Digest reported.

Barq's is No. 2 with an 8.5% share, followed by Pepsi-Cola Co.'s Mug root beer with 7.7%; Monarch Co.'s Dad's, 5.2%; and Cadbury Beverages' Hires, 4.9%. Root beer makes up about 3.5% of the total U.S. soft-drink volume. □

Insurer thinks small

By Alan Radding

Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Co. and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce are targeting small businesses with a blue-chip promotion.

Connecticut Mutual, long touting itself as "the blue chip company," created the Blue Chip Enterprise Initiative awards honoring small businesses.

The insurance company and the chamber will be honoring through this month as many as four businesses per state that have overcome adversity.

Winners' problems and solutions will be compiled in a series of printed case histories and videotapes for distribution to chamber members across the U.S. and for sale to non-member companies.

The company hopes the awards will eventually establish Connecticut Mutual as "the pre-eminent supporter of small business," said Tim Maurer, Connecticut Mutual's director of sales and marketing communications.

Reinforcing the effort is a separate print campaign from Connecticut Mutual, running through yearend. Ads in Entrepreneur, Inc., Nation's Business and regional business magazines highlight the frustrations of small-business owners. In the ads, Connecticut Mutual is positioned as a resource for small businesses.

Ingalls, Quinn & Johnson, Boston, handles advertising and some parts of the promotion. □

Subaru joins agency shakeout

By Raymond Serafin

Subaru of America's decision last week to put its ad account into review is the latest in an import-auto agency shakeout that coincides with an industrywide car sales slump.

The $60 million Subaru account would be the largest of the shifts unless incumbent Levine, Huntley, Vick & Beaver, New York, keeps the business.

Subaru hired consultant Ernst-Van Praag to help narrow a list of about 30 prospective shops to about 10 or 12 that will be visited by company officials. Eventually, Subaru will settle on three or four finalists, with a final decision expected in late June.

Starting in October 1989, when American Suzuki Motor Corp. awarded its $10 million account to Asher/Gould, Los Angeles, six accounts with total spending of about $110 million have moved to new agencies.

Following Suzuki's action were the moves of Saab-Scania of America to Angotti, Thomas, Hedge; Yugo America to Buckley DeCerchio Cavalier; Rolls-Royce Motors to Mullen Advertising; Sterling Motor Cars to Grace & Rothschild; and Volvo Cars of North America to Messner Vetere Berger Carey Schmetterer.

While circumstances vary, disappointing sales generally have been an underlying factor.

Combined car and light-truck sales reached nearly 15.8 million in 1988, but slid 7.6% in 1989 and then another 4% in 1990. For the first three months of 1991, new vehicle sales are off 19.2% from a year earlier as the industry struggles to recoup from the double whammy of recession and war.

Other accounts also are seen as shaky.

Executives from Peugeot Motors of America have visited agencies in what could be a prelude to review of its $25 million account, now at Lord, Dentsu & Partners, New York.

A persistent rumor has indicated Della Femina, McNamee's Los Angeles office was on the rocks with American Isuzu Motors, though Jerrold G. O'Connor, Isuzu's VP-marketing and service, strongly denied any dissatisfaction with the agency.

He said the company was reviewing its promotion and merchandising vendors but not its ad agency.

Likewise, Hyundai Motor America has answered rumors by saying recent personnel changes within its marketing department and the departure of a key senior executive at its agency—Backer Spielvogel Bates' Irvine, Calif., office—shouldn't be construed as a weakening of ties.

Maurice Bowen, former Hyundai national manager-advertising, recently took the new post of national manager-office of strategic planning, and Robert Clucas, formerly national manager-merchandising, succeeded him. Harry Grusche, senior VP-management representative on the account at Backer, left last month.

As for Subaru, it has been on a steady sales slide since reaching a peak of 179,100 units in 1986. But sales had fallen by 39.4% from that level by last year.

The falloff in sales and profitability led Japanese parent Fuji Heavy Industries to buy out the U.S. distributor last August, which stirred the first speculation about a review.

Subaru built a niche as a marketer of inexpensive, durable four-wheel-drive cars, but has largely failed in its bid to move its image mainstream and upscale, beginning with the introduction of the Legacy model in early 1989.

Legacy models are priced between $12,000 and $19,000, and Subaru plans to try to tap into the luxury performance coupe segment with the SVX, due out in late August or September.

Because Fuji works with Dentsu in Tokyo, that agency's DCA unit in New York is regarded as one of the candidates for the account. Other agencies regarded as contenders are Rosenfeld, Sirowitz, Humphrey & Strauss, a finalist in the recent Volvo review, and TBWA. □

Why London is no longer the creative center of Europe

By Laurel Wentz

LONDON—When NutraSweet Co. was searching for a European headquarters for its Simplesse Co. late last year, company executives considered Paris, London and Frankfurt.

In the past, this was a no-brainer. London was ultimately chosen by a majority of U.S. marketers, who were comfortable with its living conditions, location and language.

No more. NutraSweet picked Paris, while London came in third.

"London is not more central, it's isolated," said Lynn Weitzke, who moved to Paris from Connecticut in late 1990 as European marketing manager of the new Simplesse Europe. "American companies are attracted to London because of the language, but when they get to London, they discover they are more isolated."

"American companies are attracted to London because of the language, but when they get to London, they discover they are more isolated."

Simplesse isn't alone in rejecting London as the center of European advertising and marketing.

London's status has been shattered by the growing importance of continental Europe and the demise of London stock exchange funding that fueled the voracious growth of U.K. agencies, such as Saatchi & Saatchi Co. and WPP Group. As a result, London has been eclipsed by Paris, Brussels and even Ridderkerk, a town near Rotterdam chosen in January by Saatchi & Saatchi Co.-owned Howard Marlboro Group for its European headquarters.

Five months ago, Quaker Oats Co. moved the headquarters for its $1.5 billion-a-year European operations from Chicago to the most European city it could find—Brussels.

"We felt as an American company, with everyone using English as a first language, that if we located in London we could very quickly become an Anglo-American axis. That didn't take account of business done on the Continent," where Quaker's sales are $1.25 billion a year, said Richard Savage, VP-human resources of Quaker Europe.

Quaker was concerned about the difficulty of recruiting broad-minded Europeans to work in London. Mr. Savage said. In Brussels, he's hired "a really good me-

Wells Rich tests 4A's liability clause

By Joe Mandese and Scott Donaton

Time Warner and many newspapers are rejecting a Wells, Rich, Greene contract for client Continental Airlines containing a controversial "sequential liability" clause.

The new clause, which follows a recent American Association of Advertising Agencies recommendation, absolves the agency of sole liability for media bills. This is the first real test of the Four A's policy.

While some general business magazine publishers have accepted contracts containing the clause, which stipulates that the agency doesn't become liable until it's been paid by the client, other publishers have either rejected them or asked that they be modified to clarify who's liable for payment.

In other cases, newspapers have effectively ignored the issue of liability in the new contracts by requiring cash payments for the ad placements.

The clause on a Continental invoice obtained by Advertising Age reads: "Agency shall be solely liable for payment of all invoices

$40M review uncorked

As Michelob goes flat, A-B looks for change

By Gary Levin and Ira Teinowitz

Anheuser-Busch, faced with declining sales for Michelob and unhappy with the brand's current strategic approach, has put the estimated $40 million account, now at DDB Needham Worldwide, up for review.

Regular Michelob, Michelob Light, Michelob Classic Dark and Michelob Dry are said to be included in the review. Michelob Golden Draft and Golden Draft Light, now entering test markets via DDB Needham, aren't involved.

Sources said A-B will hear pitches from the incumbent's Chicago office; BBDO Worldwide, New York; Chiat/Day/Mojo, Venice, Calif.; and D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis, which handles the flagship Budweiser brand.

Agency briefings are scheduled for late April.

"Four advertising agencies have been asked to submit strategic and creative recommendations for a new Michelob family advertising assignment," said a company statement responding to queries from Advertising Age. "Details of the assignment, funding levels and an expected decision date have not been disclosed."

"Four advertising agencies have been asked to submit strategic and creative recommendations for a new Michelob family advertising assignment."

A-B declined to confirm the agency list or to elaborate; the agencies involved also declined comment.

"I haven't got the official advice [from A-B], although it wouldn't be unexpected," said Alan Pilkington, managing director of DDB Needham's Chicago office. Mr. Pilkington said he believed only regular Michelob was up for grabs, but other sources familiar with the review disputed that.

Spending behind the base Michelob brand has dropped in recent years amid slumping sales, and A-B has tried to shore it up by spending heavily to introduce the light, dark and dry versions.

A-B is expected to spend heavily to promote the Golden Draft products, if successful in test marketing.

Anheuser-Busch Cos.' overall measured media spending fell 19% to $300 million last year from 1988 spending, even as A-B acquired more theme parks, including the Sea World group.

The measured numbers don't fully reflect the switch to local media. A-B agency executives have said, as the company has pushed local promotions and balked at escalating prices for network TV sports sponsorships.

A-B spent $26 million in measured media on regular Michelob in 1989 and $2 million in 1990.

Beer discounting war intensifies

By Ira Teinowitz

Beer marketers are discounting prices in an effort to boost sales.

Distributors and analysts say price cutting is on the rise as brewers struggle to counter the recession and soften the impact of the federal excise tax increase that took effect in January.

The number of regions where discounts are being offered and the number of brand names being discounted have increased as summer approaches, distributors and analysts say.

There is "some pretty deep [price] promotion going on" by Miller Brewing Co. and Coors Brewing Co., said Jerry Steinman, publisher of Beer Marketer's Insights, a beer industry newsletter. "I don't know how much deeper than it was last year, but there are some areas where the Miller promotions are long and deep."

"From what I've heard, the promotions are earlier and deeper than last year," he said.

Industry price cutting will continue and perhaps increase, said Anheuser-Busch VP-Sales James I. Hunter III.

"In certain parts of the country, there has been some intensification," he said.

Mr. Hunter said A-B wouldn't make a major price cut as part of its summer promotions.

However, 18 months ago, A-B Chairman August A. Busch III vowed the company would respond to competitors' price cutting to avoid losing market sh

Since then A-B has permanently brought down the price of Natural Light to popular pricing from sub-premium and is testing a Natural Pilsner sibling at the popular price.

A-B also is testing Michelob Golden Draft and Michelob Golden Draft Light at premium prices rather than Michelob's superpremium level.

Ted Turner is betting his new "Airport Channel" will take off with travelers.

Turner's new gamble

How marketers view 'Airport Channel'

By Alison Fahey

Turner Broadcasting System's plan for a new channel to deliver viewers waiting at airline departure gates is stirring interest among advertisers and airlines.

The "Airport Channel," scheduled for a six-week, three-market test starting June 3, will be seen by travelers waiting at United, American and Delta gates.

The channel will be split between 70% editorial and 30% commercial time, and will be customized for each airport by Turner's Cable News Network.

Continuously updated programming will focus on news, consumer information and travel.

Turner will provide the TV sets and other hardware.

CNN President Tom Johnson said the "Airport Channel" is "another logical step" in the news organization's commitment to provide "all news, all the time, anywhere."

John Barbera, president of Turner Broadcasting Sales, said the channel's primary ad categories will be financial services including credit cards, travel-related industries and automotive.

Six national advertisers are expected to take part in the test in Atlanta, Dallas and Chicago, Mr. Barbera said. Three have already been signed—GTE Corp., General Motors Corp. and one unidentified advertiser.

"We're taking [advertising] to the people," said Philip Guarascio, GM's executive director of advertising and marketing programs. "It's no longer good enough to expect your communication system to work after somebody gets home at 7:30 at night. You have to be able to go where they are."

MasterCard International said

Key demo gains push CBS ahead in prime time

By Joe Mandese

NEW YORK—CBS-TV is the big winner in key ratings and demographics in the closest prime-time race in 2½ years.

CBS' surge has big implications for the 1991-92 prime-time upfront buying period, expected to start in mid-June and to be long and brutal.

With the networks approaching parity in their audience size and demographics, advertisers are expected to increase their leverage over networks in negotiations.

While the aggregate prime-time Nielsen rating for the Big 3 networks fell nearly 6% to 37.5, CBS' prime-time rating increased 2% to 12.3. The network was just 0.4 of a point behind No. 1 NBC-TV, which fell 13% to 12.7. ABC-TV was off 3% to 12.5.

More significantly, CBS was the only network to improve its delivery of the four key demographic groups that represent about 90% of all prime-time buys: men ages 18 to 49, women 18 to 49, men 25 to 54 and women 25 to 54.

Although CBS still trails the other two networks in those

Lintas quits Bayer account

By Pat Sloan and Gary Levin

NEW YORK—Sterling Drug and Lintas Worldwide split last week over disagreement about the wisdom of extending the Bayer name, synonymous with aspirin, into ibuprofen- or acetaminophen-based products.

"They feel one way about a subject, and we feel another way," Lintas Chairman-CEO William Weithas said after deciding not to participate in a review and resigning the estimated $25 million account it had held since 1978. "Maybe our fortunes are better somewhere else."

While Mr. Weithas declined to comment on reasons for the parting, an internal memo spoke of "strategic disagreements."

"They feel one way about a subject, and we feel another way. Maybe our fortunes are better somewhere else."

Sources say these included Lintas' opposition to extending Bayer into non-aspirin products for fear of diluting the brand.

"We are disappointed Lintas has chosen not to participate in the Bayer review and has elected to resign the account," said Terry Kelley, Sterling's director of communications. He said the company wouldn't comment on speculation about other products.

Executives at two other agencies now pursuing the account agreed that a line extension was a worrisome issue.

Sterling hasn't identified agencies vying for the business, but sources close to the situation named New York shops Ammirati & Puris, McCaffrey & McCall, Ogilvy & Mather, Altschiller Reitzfeld/Tracy-Locke, BBDO Worldwide and FCB/Leber Katz

HOT STUFF!

Haagen-Dazs Co. today breaks a $13 million campaign, including its first TV spots ever. Themed "Taaste the passion," three spots show normally controlled people who lose themselves in the richness of Haagen-Dazs' ice cream, frozen yogurt and snacks. Magazine ads support. BBDO Worldwide, New York, won the account last fall.

Burger King last week introduced its new theme, "Your way. Right away," backed by its old "Have it your way" jingle, in a new 30-second network TV spot for its BK Broiler. It ended the controversial, 19-month tenure of "Sometimes you've gotta break the rules." D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, created the spot.

MARCH AD RESULTS

Titles' ad slide worsens

By Scott Donaton

Magazine ad pages in March took their steepest plunge since the ad drought began in late 1989, Publishers Information Bureau reported.

Pages totaled 13,327.9 for the month, down 12% from March of last year. Ad revenues dipped 5.7% to $529 million.

First-quarter ad pages fell 9.6% to 35,602 from the same period in 1990; revenues declined 4.3% to $1.4 billion.

Industry observers view the sharp drop as proof the Persian Gulf War had more impact on print spending decisions than was originally believed.

Pages from the top 10 ad categories (ranked by revenue) totaled 24,718.7 in PIB-tracked magazines in the first quarter, down 9.1%. The steepest decline was posted by the business/-consumer services category: 2,391 pages, down 28.6%.

Advertising from cigarette and tobacco marketers fell 14% to 1,112.2 pages. Automotive ad pages were down 3.7% to 3,826. Computers and office equipment was the only top 10 category with a gain, up 8.8% to 1,135.3 pages.

The slump has hit most consumer magazines, including many that posted gains last year. Of the 171 titles tracked by PIB in the first quarter, 117—or 68%—carried fewer ad pages than they did a year earlier.

Fifty-two magazines recorded page gains after three months. Allure, launched in March, and Compute! are new to PIB and didn't report 1990 first-quarter figures.

Art & Antiques, which finished 1990 up 10% in pages, carried 191.3 ad pages through March, down 14.1%. Financial World saw pages soar 24.3% last year but watched them fall a whopping 49% in the first quarter to 124.6. Victoria, which posted a 43.6% page gain in 1990, registered an 11.5% drop after three months to 122.4 pages.

"Thankfully, the Persian Gulf War is over with, and I think that had the most dramatic effect," said Gail Boston, ad director of Art & Antiques. "Now that it's subsiding, things are picking up again and we're looking forward to a strong second half."

But most publishers don't expect a turnaround before the fourth quarter or early 1992.

At a recent state of the magazine industry event, American Express Publishing Corp. President Thomas O. Ryder predicted "a great Christmas."

"The business turnaround will come more slowly than expected but will be in full force by the fourth quarter," he said. "And 1992 will be a sensational year for magazines and for the advertising industry."

Business Week, 1990's ad page leader, was sixth after three months behind Bride's (807.8 pages, up 2.2%); People (663.1 pages, up 1%); Vogue (653.6 pages, down 8%); TV Guide (653.5 pages, down 18.6%); and Modern Bride (627.3 pages, down 0.7%).

Business Week's 600.8 pages represented a 20.5% decline from a year ago, when it ranked third behind TV Guide and Bride's.

More alarming is the fact that while there was just a 46.7-page gap between Business Week and top-ranked TV Guide in first-quarter 1990, Business Week trailed top-ranked Bride's by 207 pages for first-quarter 1991. □

PUBLISH-ING

Editorial and business-side developments in print media.

Seeking growth from within. Business Week is the latest magazine to explore the multimagazine ad sales arena. The weekly is considering package deals with trade titles published by parent McGraw-Hill, said Exec VP-Ad Sales Karl Spangenberg. Business Week considered hooking up with other consumer media companies, he said, but "at the present time we feel there are some resources to fully develop and exploit within the corporate umbrella."

Deals initially will be done on an ad hoc basis, Mr. Spangenberg said, but he expects the network buy to be formalized. Packages with outside media companies are still being considered.

Interview* shrinks. Interview, New York, will downsize slightly with its July issue, 10⅞ by 13½ inches, down from 10⅞ by 14½ inches. The avant-garde monthly will also revamp its front section with the issue. Interview joins such magazines as Elle, Premiere and Mirabella, which all recently announced plans to downsize to cut cost or for aesthetic reasons.

College prep. Oxendine Publishing in the fall will introduce Florida Leader, a semiannual magazine for high school students. Oxendine publishes Florida Leader for distribution at 55 colleges and universities. The high school edition will be distributed at 300 high schools; its guaranteed circulation is 50,000. Editorial written by college students will help high schoolers prepare for college, such as tips on how to get financial aid and scholarships. A b&w page is $3,964; color is $4,139. W.H. "Butch" Oxendine is publisher, editor and ad director. Offices are at 738 Northwest 23rd Ave., Gainesville, Fla. 32609. Phone: (904) 373-6907.

Upscale title checks in. Carlyle Communications International, Houston, in mid-June will launch Relais & Chateaux Magazine of North America for distribution in rooms at 35 Relais & Chateaux of North America member hotels. The title will be published in mid-June and mid-October. Michael Stafford is publisher; Stan Murray is editor and associate publisher. Ad rates are based on a three-issue buy: two issues of Relais & Chateaux Magazine and Carlyle publication Ultra's 1991-1992 "The Quintessential Guide to Living Well," a hardbound annual issue. Total circulation is estimated at 475,000. A b&w page is $27,000; a color page is $33,000.

Food for thought. Knapp Communications Corp.'s Bon Appetit expects to raise $2 million for hunger-relief programs as the national sponsor of "Taste the Nation," a weeklong series of food tastings in 75 U.S. cities that began April 21. Los Angeles-based Knapp also will donate to hunger relief organizations a portion of the revenues from a special section in the monthly's April issue.

Southern Homes* redecorates. Southern Homes, Atlanta, will unveil a new look and focus with its May/June issue. In an effort to reverse last year's 19% ad page decline, the home design publication has expanded coverage of remodeling, food, entertainment and gardening. The magazine is narrowing its focus from Georgia to Atlanta, evidenced by the new subhead, "Atlanta's Magazine for Better Living." □

Gains for CBS

demos, the network's gains coupled with its competitors' losses have narrowed the gap.

"In terms of audience composition, the three networks are becoming barely more distinguishable than nine letters in the alphabet," said Steve Sternberg, director of broadcast research for Bozell, New York.

"No one network is going to have as much leverage against any given demographic as they have had in the past," Mr. Sternberg noted.

"When you are dealing with three suppliers, it's always good for a buyer to have parity. It gives us choices," said Lou Schultz, Lintas:USA exec VP-director of media services.

Parity "gives the advantage to the buyer rather than the seller," said Linda Urben, AT&T Co.'s district manager for media advertising. "So we're looking forward to the upfront."

"It opens up your options in the sense that there is no must-buy for almost any program strategy," said George Mahrlig, director of media services for Campbell Soup Co. "If you're looking for a series with real marquee value, you can start shopping any of the networks. There was a time where NBC was the only place to go. So, people with that strategy were kind of hamstrung. Now, you can look for some of that from everybody."

CBS could still have enough momentum to close the gap in key demos this season, said David Poltrack, VP-planning and research.

Lintas' Mr. Schultz downplayed the significance of that momentum, however.

"This is really more of a case where standing still is winning, because the other guys are losing so much."

Mr. Poltrack noted that the demographic shifts should spark changes in the portion of advertiser budgets allocated to each network in the prime-time marketplace for next year.

According to Arbitron's Broadcast Advertisers Reports, NBC had a 44.2% share of the $5.2 billion spent in prime-time during 1990, compared with ABC's 31.9% and CBS' 23.9%.

Moreover, Mr. Poltrack said CBS continues to strengthen its position among adults ages 35 to 54, a group he said will grow increasingly important to marketers.

"This is the only segment that will grow during the 1990s," he said, adding that it represents a disproportionate share of U.S. buying power.

"It is going to become the biggest demo," said Bozell's Mr. Sternberg. "Within the next couple of years, about a third of the total TV audience will be 35 to 54."

Network prime-time buying patterns are already starting to skew toward older audiences, he said.

"We're seeing a much greater buying emphasis now on 25-to-54-year-olds, where it used to be much more on 18 to 49," he said. "Now they're about equal."

Eight of the series returning to CBS' schedule this season performed better than the previous season. These include "60 Minutes," "The Sunday Night Movie," "Murphy Brown," "Major Dad," "Designing Women," "Rescue 911," "The Tuesday Night Movie" and "Guns of Paradise."

With the exception of "60 Minutes," most of those shows contributed to CBS' improvement among younger demos, particularly "Designing Women" and "Murphy Brown."

But while CBS continues to position itself to marketers as the "adult network," its audience actually grew more youthful this season.

It gained in adults 18 to 34 and teens 12 to 17 but lost share in adults 55-plus. Consequently, the median age of CBS' prime-time viewers dropped to 44 from 45 last year. NBC's median viewer age increased to 41 from 39. ABC remained at 35.

"It's become much more of a three-network race," said Betsy Frank, senior VP-director of TV information and new media for Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising. "CBS isn't just leading among people 55-plus. Not only have they gained among the people who have always watched them, but they've gained among the people who haven't watched them much at all." □

Dow's rally leaves media stocks dry

By Gary Levin and Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—The rally that pushed the Dow Jones industrial average above 3,000 for the first time last week hasn't been reflected in most media and ad agency stocks.

Hurt by a weak U.S. advertising business, both sectors last week posted mostly modest stock gains, despite the run-up in the Dow, a composite average of leading industrial stocks.

Analysts said the Dow movement reflects lower interest rates and signs of an upturn among the major companies that make up the average.

"Advertising stocks haven't been generating much growth in the early part of the year, so they really haven't participated in the latest stage of the rally," said Greg Ostroff, an analyst at Goldman, Sachs & Co. "If we see a sudden shift in the economy over the next couple of weeks, these stocks will start to do better."

"The reason media stocks have lagged is, I think, a reflection of the state of the media business," said Ed Atorino, media analyst with Salomon Bros. "Things are bad and show no signs of getting better."

James Dougherty, analyst at County NatWest Securities USA, said some agency and media stocks rose substantially during the first quarter as a whole. He cited Omnicom Group; Interpublic Group of Cos.; Foote, Cone & Belding Communications; Reader's Digest Association; and Heritage Media Corp. as big gainers.

Among agencies, Interpublic rose 4.5% last week, closing at $46.75; FCB was up 0.9% to $27.25; Omnicom was unchanged at $29.75; Saatchi & Saatchi Co.'s U.S.-traded shares were virtually unchanged, rising to $1.25; and WPP Group was down 4.7% to $7.63, but is up 49% from the end of March.

PaineWebber analyst Alan Gottesman last week lowered his Interpublic earnings estimate 7% to $2.50, citing the continuing weak U.S. environment and a slowdown in growth overseas. He said the company's stock price "may be a little ahead of itself."

Among major media company stocks, CBS last week rose 1.2%, closing at $161.88; Dow Jones & Co. was up 8% to $27; The New York Times Co. climbed 7.2% to $22.38; McGraw-Hill was up 0.4% to $60.25; and Time Warner was unchanged at $115. □

Coors in a (rabbit) stew over parody

By Ira Teinowitz

Eveready Battery Co. is hopping mad at Coors.

Coors Brewing Co. plans to run a new commercial for Coors Light that's a parody of Eveready's Energizer spots showing a pink bunny interrupting a commercial for a make-believe product.

The Coors spot was originally set to break April 28, but when Eveready found out about the commercial the schedule was changed.

"We take strongest exception to their ad," said Patrick Farrell, manager-corporate information for Eveready parent Ralston Purina Co. "We have contacted Coors and asked for a copy of the ad."

At press time, Eveready and Coors were in discussions about the commercial. Coors postponed the spot's airing temporarily but hoped to have it on the air this week.

The Coors Light commercial at first appears to be a typical beer spot with a deep, resonant voice-over. But then, close-ups

K-III joins ranks of top publishers

Murdoch buy leaves it hungry for more

By Scott Donaton

K-III Holdings' planned acquisition of most of Rupert Murdoch's U.S. publications is only the beginning.

K-III, a partnership between investment banker Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and a group of publishing executives led by William F. Reilly, reached an agreement last week to acquire nine publications from debt-laden News Corp. for $650 million.

Mr. Reilly, chairman-ceo of the investment partnership, said K-III plans to use the nine News Corp. titles as "the mother ship" on which to build a massive consumer publishing company.

"The Murdoch magazines are a fabulous platform," he said. "We would expect in the coming months and years to be buying individual titles and adding them to the group.

"We've reached an agreement in principle, but the contract is not signed yet," Mr. Reilly said. The deal is expected to be finalized by June, he added.

Mr. Reilly denied industry speculation that K-III was buying the group with the intent of spinning off individual properties at a profit.

"We would expect . . . to be buying individual titles and adding them to the group."

"There are no plans to sell anything," he said. "We want to buy more."

Negotiations are in the due diligence phase, during which K-III will verify financial and other information about the publications supplied by News Corp. during the sale talks.

The sale will, in one step, establish K-III among the nation's largest consumer magazine publishers. The nine titles it's acquiring have combined annual revenues of about $300 million, Mr. Reilly said.

Revenues from K-III's other operating units are about $500 million, giving the company combined revenues of some $800 million.

The sale also lightens Mr. Murdoch's estimated $8.2 billion debt load, acquired during a 1980s spending spree that included the $3 billion acquisition of Triangle Publications, including TV Guide, in 1988. Mr. Murdoch has since acknowledged that he paid too much for the weekly, which isn't included in the K-III deal.

K-III is acquiring eight consumer magazines and the Daily Racing Form, a highly profitable newspaper covering thoroughbred racing and which Mr. Murdoch placed on the selling block apart from his magazine group.

Surprisingly, Mirabella, which

FDA getting tougher

Seizure of Citrus Hill is signal to marketers

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—The Food & Drug Administration last week sent a message to marketers: Business won't be the same.

When newly installed FDA Commissioner David Kessler ordered some 2,400 cases of Procter & Gamble Co.'s Citrus Hill Fresh Choice orange juice seized, it was a regulatory milestone.

D. Kessler

Although the FDA has conducted product seizures before, it was the first time the agency has ever taken such severe action against a prominent marketer over a labeling dispute.

The April 24 seizure in Minneapolis was implemented for the widest effect after last-minute talks between federal officials and P&G representatives broke up at 10:30 p.m. April 23 with no mutual agreement.

"The use of the term 'fresh' on this product is false and misleading, and it is confusing to consumers," Dr. Kessler said at the time of the seizure. This sends "a clear message that the FDA will not tolerate such violations of the law," he said.

"The fact that Kessler went after P&G and not a little guy shows that Kessler knows what he's doing with regard to getting publicity," said John Kamp, VP of the American Association of Advertising Agencies. He added: "I also hear that Kessler is walking the halls looking for other cases to pursue. This may have been the first shot over the bow, but

P&G gives in, axes its 'Fresh' label

By Jennifer Lawrence

Citrus Hill products were ordered seized in Hopkins, Minn.

Procter & Gamble Co. will change the label on its Citrus Hill Fresh Choice orange juice following a long, losing battle with the Food & Drug Administration.

P&G agreed to remove all references to "fresh" from its packaging, just two days after the FDA took steps to halt distribution of the orange juice, to be renamed simply Citrus Hill.

Several high-level P&G executives were in final negotiations Friday with FDA Commissioner David Kessler and other FDA officials to reach a settlement. Details were being worked out late in the day.

Federal inspectors on April 24 had seized 2,400 cases of Citrus Hill Fresh Choice from a Minnesota warehouse after P&G's earlier refusal to make labeling changes.

The complaint filed April 24 in U.S. District Court in Minneapolis by federal prosecutors on behalf of the FDA said Citrus Hill Fresh Choice is misbranded because "the labeling is false and

Weight Watchers reviews $30M account

PITTSBURGH—H.J. Heinz Co. is reviewing its $30 million Weight Watchers International weight loss system account as part of a worldwide company initiative to maximize marketing dollars. Not affected is the $27 million account of Weight Watchers foods, marketed by Heinz's Foodways National unit. Both accounts are handled by DDB Needham Worldwide, New York; the agency will participate in the review. Heinz said about 10 other, unidentified agencies would be asked to pitch. Sources said three of the shops are Heinz agencies Leo Burnett USA, Chicago; Ketchum Advertising, Pittsburgh; and Ally & Gargano, New York. Others pitching were identified by sources as Ammirati & Puris;

States shop for new agencies

An Advertising Age roundup

Many ad agencies are planning to stay close to home this summer to pitch their state's tourism, economic development and lottery accounts.

Tight economic conditions, forcing agencies to hunt harder for new business, have resulted in heavier than usual responses to the state reviews. Some reviews have drawn interest from agencies that in the past may have shunned $3 million or $4 million accounts.

Politics also factor into the competition. The arrival of new administrations in states including Connecticut, Illinois, Massachusetts and Ohio has encouraged agencies to expect reviews for state business will be more wide open than in the past several years.

Some states have cut back spending for tourism, economic development or lottery advertising, but agency interest has never been higher.

"In this economy, it'll be a shootout, no question, but accounts of this size, limited to in-state agencies, aren't too plentiful, so you have to go for it," said Bruce I. Carlson, chairman-ceo of Grant/Jacoby, Chicago, which is gearing up to pursue the $21 million Illinois State Lottery account.

"It's a high-visibility account, and something where the cause is good, too. The money goes to schools. That's worth something, too."

Tourism accounts especially can give an agency not only a higher in-state profile but also exposure to out-of-state marketers.

North Dakota this summer will review its $2 million tourism account, the largest single piece of advertising business in the state. Incumbent G.L. Ness Agency, Fargo, is such a favorite that interest in the review is down.

"There are only six real full-service agencies in the state," said Director of Tourism Jim Fuglie, "but Ness has won several awards for its work, so I think some of them won't even try [for the account] this year."

Budget figures are in millions. *Projected. Completed. Source: Advertising Age

In larger states, tourism and lottery accounts can represent substantial billings, and therefore draw interest from top national agencies.

The New York Department of Economic Development this year cut its combined tourism/economic development ad budget 14.3% to $6 million but hasn't had any trouble attracting big-name shops. Wells, Rich, Greene, New York, has held the account since 1977 and could keep it, but other finalists for the business, which will be decided in May, are Ally & Gargano; Della Femina, McNamee; Grey Advertising; Lintas:New York; and McCann-Erickson Worldwide, all New York.

On the other coast, the California Department of Health Services this year will open a competition to handle its anti-smoking campaign. Gov. Pete Wilson's proposed budget allocates $15 million for the account, down from the $28.6 million spent on it over an 18-month period ending June 30, 1991.

The department won't issue a request for proposals until the Legislature passes a budget—probably not until July—but many agencies are expected to pursue the business when that happens.

The work of incumbent Livingston & Keye, Venice, was praised by Jacquolyn Duerr, chief of the department's media campaign unit.

But "there's an absolute commitment to make this a clean, unbiased, competitive process," she said. "Livingston & Keye will not have any different standing than any other agency."

Bozell, Chicago, has handled the Illinois State Lottery since it began in 1974 but is seen as vulnerable this year following the arrival of a new governor and lottery director. Competition for the $21 million account is expected to be heavy when the review is formally opened, perhaps next month.

Illinois' Department of Commerce & Community Affairs has begun a review of the state's $11 million tourism account, now at McConnaughy Stein Schmidt Brown. The state has advised agencies that they will need minimum billings of $30 million to join the review.

In most regions, in-state agencies have an edge—sometimes unstated—in state account competitions.

"Legally, we're not allowed to give preference to an in-state agency—you have to put it out for bid—but in actuality, if you're not an in-state agency you have two strikes against you," said Abe Baum, director of advertising for Arizona, which likely won't review its $5 million account, now at Taylor Advertising, Phoenix, until 1993. □

Kroger cut may shift $22M

By Julie Liesse

Kroger Co.'s decision to eliminate its corporate advertising function is part of continuing decentralization at the nation's largest supermarket company.

Although Kroger's move jeopardizes the $22 million in Kroger Food Stores billings handled by Campbell-Mithun-Esty, Chicago (AA, April 22), CME says it intends to try and keep all the business.

Kroger earlier this month notified CME it won't renew its corporate advertising contract, which expires at the end of July, said Paul Bernish, director-public relations.

Instead, continuing a long process of decentralization, Kroger will allow ad managers in its 11 marketing areas to handle their own advertising, including selecting an agency.

"What we are doing is not because of any problems with Campbell-Mithun-Esty," Mr. Bernish said. "This is just a reflection of continuing decentralization at Kroger.

"Our marketing areas have had increasing autonomy, increasing responsibility for merchandising. Now they also can choose their own advertising agency, including writing separate contracts with CME if they wish. But there are no corporate dictates," he said.

Kroger's regional divisions already had control of all print ads, accounting for 80% of total Kroger Food Stores ad spending.

"It didn't make sense to have the remaining 20% done differently," Mr. Bernish said. "In some ways, this is a fait accompli. Some of our divisions already have used local agencies anyway. And they all buy their own ad time."

Kroger Food Stores spent $49.5 million in measured media last year, about half of that in newspapers, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service, which doesn't monitor all newspaper advertising. The $22 million spent on spot TV, in addition to some creative work on print ads, was handled by CME.

The 11 Kroger divisions, representing about 1,000 supermarkets overall, are headquartered in Atlanta; Cincinnati; Columbus, Ohio; Dallas; Detroit; Houston; Indianapolis; Little Rock, Ark.; Memphis and Nashville, Tenn.; and Roanoke, Va. The Little Rock division doesn't use CME and has been handling its own advertising for about six months.

Mr. Bernish said it's too early to tell how the other 10 divisions would decide to handle advertising.

The agency will try "to work out details on a division-by-division basis. We are looking forward to sitting down with each ad manager" for each marketing area, said Marvin Goldsmith, president-ceo of CME's Chicago office.

Kroger has been a CME client for 35 years.

"We have always been structured to serve Kroger and its individual marketing areas; they have operated as independent areas for a long time," Mr. Goldsmith said. "Now, we'll be more focused on opportunities in each market area."

CME's Chicago office had billings of $179 million last year. □

'Recession-proof' industry feels pinch

Even couponing boom seen as step back to field industry wants to outgrow

By Scott Hume

In a recession, marketers begin thinking short-term sales—even at the expense of profit margins or brand image—and they increase efforts to improve relations with the trade.

That translates into bad news for media advertising, good news for the promotional marketing business.

That, at least, had been the conventional wisdom since the promotion business surged during the recession of the late 1970s and early 1980s.

But the realities of the current recessionary climate have forced some rethinking of that axiom.

According to Advertising Age's survey of sales promotion agencies, gross income rose 14.1% in 1990, compared with the previous year. That's down from 17.4% growth in 1989.

Also, 63.9% of survey respondents say they expect 1991 client spending to increase in the 1%-to-10% range, hardly a banner year for a business that thrives in recessionary periods.

There is disagreement over how seriously hurt by the recession promotion agencies have been—disagreement determined in part by how closely shops have been aligned with such hobbled industries as automobiles and retailing.

But most promotion executives agree the recession has at least changed the nature of their business during the past year.

"Many in the industry previously thought that promotional marketing was recession-proof, and that if we did slide into a recession, we'd see cuts in staffing at major corporations and more work for promotion agencies," says William Urseth, who recently sold his interest in promotion agency U.S. Communications, Minneapolis, and is now chairman of U.S. Directives, a crisis-management consultancy.

Those kinds of staff cuts haven't materialized, he says. "Now I'm inclined to modify that to think the business is largely recession-proof," Mr. Urseth says.

'Fill the top': The wild rush for more clients. P. 37

Business may be good, even better, in some categories, but the business also has gotten more difficult.

"Clients are more budget-conscious than before—across the board. Advertising and promotion. And they're more careful in execution of marketing programs," Mr. Urseth says.

Alan Maites, president of William A. Robinson Inc., Chicago, has seen a similar scenario.

"We haven't seen significant cuts in staffing or spending by our clients, but companies certainly are giving much more scrutiny to their spending," he says.

Quantitative measurement of the level of promotional marketing is difficult to locate, but by at least one measure, one segment of sales promotion has seen robust growth during the past year.

According to the Summary Scan! division of the Advertising Checking Bureau, package-goods marketers issued 306.8 billion cents-off coupons in 1990, a whopping 16.7% increase over 1989, a year when the number of coupons issued rose only 4%.

The recession is "definitely a major cause of that increase last year," says Summary Scan! Director Bill Green. "In a slow economy, manufacturers tend to issue more coupons and more incentives to keep consumers buying and keep them from trading down to store brands. And that appears to be what happened in 1990."

But while an increase in couponing may have meant increased business for some, others say it hasn't necessarily been good for the business as a whole. It may represent a regression to the sort of promotional marketing the industry had been seeking to outgrow.

"We haven't seen innovation in package-goods marketing. We've seen a retreat to dumping more coupons and freestanding inserts," says Greg Hawn, president of Greg Hawn & Associates, Chicago.

"In the quick-service restaurant industry you've got McDonald's following Taco Bell's lead and putting price points on banners on the front of their stores. Something you thought you'd never see.

"I'd hoped to see more value-added promotions, but it takes more planning to do solid value-added programs, and long-term planning has suffered."

Mr. Hawn says the "belief in promotional marketing as recession-proof hasn't come to pass. Things have been tough everywhere."

The Persian Gulf War introduced an unexpected "double whammy," he says. "This recession has probably affected the promotion industry more than anticipated and more than the 1982 recession because of the additional uncertainty over the war situation.

"That brought an across-

Sales promotion income climbs to $637.7 million

But the 14.1% gain in growth shows slippage

By Kenneth Wylie

The sales promotion industry may have fared better than many sectors of advertising and marketing in last year's sluggish economy. But it also took a hit.

Gross income among the sales promotion companies responding to Advertising Age's fourth annual industry survey rose 14.1% to $637.7 million, compared with 6.4% growth among the Top 500 advertising agencies (AA, March 25).

Despite the 14.1% increase, growth in sales promotion gross income fell from 17.4% in 1989. Of the 103 agencies ranked, 25% saw declines in gross income.

Promotional services agencies, which generate most of their revenues from sales promotion services, such as sweepstakes or premiums, contributed total gross revenues of $431.4 million, up 17% over 1989.

Sales promotion agencies, which focus on strategic planning and concept development, composed 25% of the sample and contributed $206.2 million in total gross income, up 8.5% from 1989. (See methodology, Page 34.)

Leading the promotional services group of 77 agencies is DCI Marketing, with gross income of $61.6 million, up 12.6% from 1989. DCI, based in Milwaukee, specializes in point-of-purchase and merchandising systems.

Clarion Marketing & Communications ranked No. 1 among 26 sales promotion agency respondents, with gross income of $26 million, up 39% from the previous year. A unit of D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, the Greenwich, Conn.-based agency got an infusion of direct response billings in 1990 from DMB&B Direct, which recently was merged under the Clarion name.

The uncertain economy last year hit promotional agencies in various ways.

Overall employment grew 6.4% compared with less than 1% in '89. Employment growth seemingly was dominated by promotional services agencies, up 8.2% last year, compared with 3% growth for sales promotion shops.

But employment growth in the promotional services category was skewed by two agencies, BDS Marketing, Irvine, Calif., and MarketSource, Cranbury, N.J. Without their figures, employment growth for that group nudged forward only 2.6%.

BDS, under new president Beverly Totman-Ham, rose from a near ruinous slump two years ago to rank No. 9. Gross income jumped to $11.1 million last year, up 327.7% over 1989. Employment levels shot up to 150 in 1990, from 40 in 1989.

No. 6-ranked MarketSource reported 210 employees, up from 150 in the prior year, as it staffed up to meet demands in its area of specialty, event marketing.

Increased emphasis on strategic planning has allowed some agencies to cut back to a core staff and rely on free-lancers to carry the rest of the business.

"Clients used to come in and say they wanted T-shirts and premiums. Now they say, 'Look at us and tell us how to solve our problem,' " says Mark Mitchell, president of Mitchell & Co., Toledo, the No. 54 promotional services agency.

The shop has cut staff from 42 in 1987 to 17 last year and uses free-lancers frequently to fill in promotional services functions, while full-time staffers focus on strategic planning.

Intra-agency mergers, acquisitions and divestitures turned agency ownership into a revolving door in 1990.

British holding company FKB Group, which had assembled an impressive array of U.S. sales promotion shops since 1988, fell prey to its own acquisitiveness when it was forced to sell its U.S. holdings to service its debt.

Management at former FKB shop Louis London, St. Louis, No.

The road not taken isn't always the better choice.

Sometimes people recognize the best route and take it. And more people follow suit.

Take, for instance, CMS, the largest manufacturer's coupon redemption agent in the packaged goods industry. With 38% market share, it's clear that manufacturers view CMS as the better choice for their couponing needs.

We won't disagree.

We think it's because we provide the highest quality data collection, a newly enhanced forecasting system that is unparalled, and the fastest, most accurate payments possible. Or maybe it's because our customer service acts so quickly on our clients' requests.

Why not give us a call at 1-800-334-8440, and see how we do things. Then you'll know why others have chosen to travel with us.

Then you can make the better choice.

Methodology

Agencies submitting figures in this report are categorized in two ways.

- Sales promotion agencies are fee-oriented agencies that draw 50% of gross income from sales promotion; staff-time fees and/or retainer fees comprise 50% or more of total gross income; concept development and strategic planning functions make up at least 40% of fees.
- Promotional services agencies focus on one or more sales promotion functions, such as sweepstakes, tie-ins, graphics-collateral, merchandising-point of purchase, etc. Time-of-staff fees, described as "professional services" or "account service," are less than 40% of total gross income; the bulk of revenues comes from creative work, execution, fulfillment and/or markups for production materials.

Included in this group are direct marketing and advertising agencies with strong sales promotion functions. These agencies are ranked by total gross income if sales promotion represents more than 50% of returns. If sales promotion gross income is less than 50%, the agencies are ranked only if sales promotion is one of the top two contributors to total gross income, and then they are ranked solely on gross income derived from sales promotion. □

Income

43 among promotional services agencies, bought itself back last year. Carlson Cos., Minneapolis, acquired FKB's Saugatuck Group, Westport, Conn., in August. Another former FKB shop, American Consulting Corp., No. 10 among sales promotion agencies last year, was dissolved, while QLM, No. 18 on last year's sales promotion agencies ranking, was bought by management.

The depressed U.K. stock market opened KLP Group to acquisition by Paris-based RSCG Group. KLP's lone U.S. property changing hands was Comart-KLP, ranking No. 7 among U.S. promotional services agencies.

Cato Johnson Worldwide, a unit of Young & Rubicam, New York, broadened its base when Y&R reorganized its sales promotion and direct-response units. Under the new alignment, Hutchins/-Y&R, New York, and Arthur Wilk Communications, Chicago, now report to Cato. □

Sales promotion's badge of honor

Agency-of-record status builds in importance for shops

By Laurie Freeman

Garnering agency-of-record status has never been more important to sales promotion agencies.

In recent months, Quaker Oats Co. appointed William A. Robinson Inc., Chicago, as its sales promotion agency of record for Aunt Jemima syrups, pancake mix and frozen breakfast foods.

AT&T Co.'s Special Long Distance unit accorded Einson Freeman, Paramus, N.J., agency-of-record status for out-of-home long-distance services; and Kentucky Fried Chicken Corp. awarded agency-of-record status to Coddington, Chadwick & Meyerson, New York.

What these marketers found was "if you keep bringing agencies in and out on a project basis, they don't know your business as well as they should," says Lee Blitch, product marketing director at the AT&T unit.

"It takes time to bring an agency up to date . . . time that you don't always have in a competitive marketplace."

With the rise of scanner-based technologies and increased retail trade power over shelf space, information-sharing between client companies and sales promotion agencies is becoming crucial.

"With an agency of record, you're probably more willing to share a broader amount of information with them because you're in a permanent relationship," says John Lowrie, VP-division general manager, consumer products, Reynolds Metals Co. Einson Freeman has been Reynolds' agency of record for three and a half years.

Agency-of-record status, a long-sought prize for its financial stability, remains an uphill climb.

Advertising Age's 1991 survey of sales promotion agencies shows 51.9% of respondents say one-fourth or fewer of their clients named them agency of record. Another 22.8% say one-fourth to half of their clients bestowed the honor on them. Only 25.3% of respondents say they have agency-of-record status with more than half of their clients.

A recent Council of Sales Promotion Agencies survey of 50 client companies offers similar findings: 58% of the companies sampled say they work with shops on a project basis only. Thirty percent say they work on both a retainer and project basis, while only 12% say they work on a retainer basis only.

But the fact it's not pervasive doesn't mean shops don't yearn for agency-of-record recognition.

"It means we're sitting on the same side of the table as the strategic partner," says Einson Freeman President Jeff McElnea.

The recognition "gives you an opportunity to assign people full-time to the business and retain continuity," says Llewellyn Ross, exec VP and a principal of QLM Associates, Princeton, N.J.

Without such status, sales promotion agency executives say they often are left out of the information loop, a situation that hampers marketing efforts.

"When you're not on some kind of agreement, the client gives you only half the information you need," says Michael Wahl, president, Howard Marlboro Group, New York. "When that happens, you end up doing work that is the right solution to the wrong problem."

The promotion business no longer involves creating "just an FSI or a sweepstakes," says Alan Maites, president of William A. Robinson. "More and more clients are looking at us as marketing and strategic partners."

> "If you're on a project basis, you're in a selling mode."

Quaker Oats, in naming the agency to handle Aunt Jemima promotions late last year, has made it "a member of the team together with brand marketing people, internal promotion people, R&D, manufacturing people," Mr. Maites says.

"We're getting the [marketing] information at the same time the internal people are. It has proved to be a real partnership."

Quaker Oats believes working with a promotion agency in an agency-of-record capacity helps establish a marketing partnership with the brand.

"It gives [the agency] a chance to focus on what [the marketer] wants to do [with the brand] in terms of long-range plans," says Laura Jackson, media relations coordinator.

For some sales promotion shops, agency-of-record status has become standard operating procedure. At Frankel & Co., Chicago, 98% of the company's business is conducted on such a basis, with the remainder project assignments. That's compared with 60% 10 years ago.

"We don't try to get project work; our entire focus is on long-term relationships," says Chairman Bud Frankel. "If you're on a project basis, you're in a selling mode, which I think is a negative situation."

Still, some companies always will sincerely believe they'll miss out on a hot promotion if they tie themselves to one sales promotion agency, executives admit.

"Some clients will shy away from [agency of record] for sales promotion agencies," says Mr. Maites. "Instead, they may look at [it] for a specific product or division. And we encourage them to do that, too."

However, few sales promotion agencies will turn down project work. One reason is agencies can charge clients substantial premiums—as much as 20% more, according to one agency—for non-retainer work.

In many instances, clients that originally come in the door for project work only become convinced agency-of-record status is the right thing to do, Mr. Ross says.

"It's a nice vote of confidence from a client that says 'Hey, you're our partner in our marketing effort.' " □

'Fill the top because the bottom always leaks'

By Laura Loro

For sales promotion shops, too much of a good thing can be dangerous.

McCracken Brooks Communications learned that tough lesson last year when the Minneapolis-based shop lost its two biggest accounts: CVN Television, a cable shopping channel, and G. Heileman Brewing Co., which had grown to account for 40% of the shop's business.

The agency recovered, replacing about two-thirds of the business with three accounts: Coors Brewing Co., Land O'Lakes and Coca-Cola Foods. Other smaller pieces made up the rest, says Keith McCracken, president-ceo.

"What we did is dig in and get very aggressive about new business," Mr. McCracken says.

New-business acquisitions in 1991 include Heinz Pet Products, K-Tel International, E.J. Brach Corp., Freezer Queen Foods and Northrup King Co., a lawn and garden company.

Client totals have increased from 12 during the CVN/Heileman days to more than 20.

"What we did is dig in and get very aggressive about new business."

"The degree to which you can control those percentages is the degree to which you can be successful," he says.

Revenues in 1990 remained flat but are expected to grow 40% in 1991 to more than $5.2 million, Mr. McCracken says.

But not all agencies have learned the lesson.

Advertising Age's 1991 survey of sales promotion shops shows 27.4% of respondents report one or two clients account for at least 50% of revenues.

An additional 26.2% rely on three clients for half of their revenues, while another 21.4% rely on four or five clients for half of their business.

Only 25% of the shops surveyed are diversified to the point where they rely on more than five clients for 50% of their revenues. However, experiences such as those of McCracken Brooks are leading more shops to try to join that elite 25%.

"There is a natural tendency on the part of sales promotion agencies—as well as ad agencies—when you have a highly profitable and expanding relationship with a client, to exploit that," says Thomas Conlon, chairman-ceo of D.L. Blair Corp., Garden City, N.Y.

"But it becomes risky from an agency's standpoint when one or two clients represent such a large part of profitability," he says.

There is no real industry rule of thumb on how billings should be apportioned among clients. Most agencies establish their own comfort point.

"Five or six clients representing 50% of business is healthy," says Joseph Flanagan, president of Impact, Chicago. "When you get down to two pieces of business representing 50%, you get into a danger zone."

While no agency would turn away a big client, shops must continually watch their client mix, Mr. Conlon says.

"It is incumbent upon an agency to review, every six months to a year, the importance of each of its clients. If one or more clients reaches a point of disproportionate business, the agency has to get out and reduce the percentage from new business or increase billings from all of its clients," he says.

Comart-KLP monitors billing apportionment "at least yearly," says Chairman-CEO Vincent Sottosanti. "And our instincts monitor it constantly.

"You can't fire your best client if it represents too much volume. You do a full-court press to get" additional business, he says.

His agency is doing just that. Chemical Bank, which had represented 15% of total business, left in 1990.

"If that had represented one-third or more [of billings], we would not be able to survive," Mr. Sottosanti says.

The key to maintaining client balance is to never have new business take a back seat, Mr. Flanagan says.

"Always continue to fill the top of the cup because there is always stuff leaking out of the bottom. It's just the way it is," he says.

If an agency has expertise in a certain area, it can be expanded to include, not conflicting clients,

Notes: Dollars are in thousands. Rankings for agencies are based on gross income, defined as billings to clients less outside costs. Rankings for 1989 are computed from figures reported in 1990. Employee totals are limited to full-time personnel. Abbreviations used in leading service column denote: consulting, direct marketing, event marketing, graphics/collateral, merchandising/p.o.p., premiums/incentives, price promotion, promotional advertising, promotional packaging, sales meetings/A.V., sampling, sweepstakes/games/contests, telemarketing and tie-ins. Leading service does not include concept development and strategic planning. ✓ indicates an independent accountant verified figures. 1. Gross income includes minor portions of income from services other than sales promotion; 2. Gross income is limited to sales promotion returns; 3. Figures from 1989 are for 3 months. * indicates gross income is an AA estimate. See Page 34 for methodology. Source: Advertising Age survey.

the-board freeze on marketing budgets," he says. "Only what had to be done in the marketplace was done."

That one-two punch caught manufacturers off guard, Mr. Hawn says, but he also says the promotion industry wasn't prepared because it was riding "the promotion-is-booming euphoria."

Vincent Sottosanti, president of Comart-KLP, New York, says both sides "were caught short by this recession" because business for both had been so strong since '82.

"But now that the recession is settling in, advertisers are taking the time to plan ahead . . . and are again looking at goals that are best served by promotion. So there's been an uptick," he says.

Nevertheless, the promotion business has been changed, perhaps permanently, by the recession, he says.

"We've never had so many clients require justification for promotional marketing recommendations. It reflects the pressures to make marketing more accountable," he says. "And some of the old-boy-network relationships are gone in this climate. That's all OK, but it's different."

Lee Flaherty, president of Flair Communications, Chicago, says, "A recession is nature's way of telling you it's time to make changes, and I think this industry has had to stop and re-evaluate some things.

"Clients too are re-examining how to turn up the [sales] volume," he adds. "I think they're coming to appreciate the value of promotions again, but it has been after some reconsideration."

One change has been increased spending on what Mr. Flaherty calls the "hidden places in marketing," such as sales motivation and incentive programs. Several agencies say clients have asked them to develop more internal motivation and training programs.

"Clients are looking at areas like relations with the trade and distribution. There's a heavy focus on alternatives to media advertising," Mr. Maites says. "And that has gotten us looking at all the various promotional media available more than ever before."

Although many promotion executives say they expect to see marketing budgets loosen up by this year's fourth quarter, the promotion industry that emerges from the economic downturn may be fundamentally different from the one that entered it, they believe. □

A LOT OF NEW YORK MONEY LIVES IN FAIRFIELD COUNTY.

Any advertiser wanting to hit home with the high end income core of the N.Y. ADI had better zero in on Fairfield County: home of the highest per capita Effective Buying Income and highest average household EBI in the U.S.

but allied clients. For example, if an agency has a hardware manufacturer as a client, a software client would be a good prospect, Mr. Flanagan says.

Despite seeking clients in related fields, Mr. Flanagan is wary of having too many clients in one industry.

"You don't want to be caught in an industry which is suddenly caught in a downturn. You have three or four pieces in that industry and [you can be hurt]," he says.

It is also important to match client size and agency size, Mr. McCracken says.

"Very big agencies are going after small pieces of business and very small agencies are going after large pieces of business—that could only result in failure. It's crucial that an agency decide the volume of business—to be profitable and to meet the needs of the client," Mr. McCracken says. □

Changing fashions

New publishers try to shape up magazines

By Scott Donaton

The recent appointments of three new publishers at leading women's fashion magazines is expected to intensify the war for advertising in the troubled category.

Hearst Corp. last week named Carl Portale publisher of Harper's Bazaar, from the same post at Murdoch Magazines' European Travel & Life. Mr. Portale, 51, succeeds Martin Schrader, 66, who retires next month after 14 years at the magazine's helm.

In December, Anne Sutherland Fuchs jumped from publisher of Hachette Magazines' Elle to publisher of Conde Nast Publications' Vogue, the fashion category leader. Hachette, in turn, hired New York Magazine Associate Publisher Lawrence Burstein as Elle's new publisher.

The changes at Harper's Bazaar also come amid growing speculation the magazine's longtime editor, Anthony Mazzola, will retire or be replaced in the near future. Mr. Mazzola joined Hearst in 1948 and has been editor in chief of Harper's Bazaar since 1972.

Hearst Magazines President D. Claeys Bahrenburg declined to comment on rumors about Mr. Mazzola.

"I'm very pleased with the work Tony's doing," he said.

The fashion magazine field has been hurt not only by the recession and general downturn in ad pages but by the deeper troubles of the fashion and retail industries and increased competition from upstarts like Murdoch Magazines' Mirabella.

In first quarter 1991, ad pages fell 8% at Vogue, 11.1% at Elle and 20.4% at Harper's Bazaar, compared with the same period last year.

"Obviously, these are very competitive times for the advertising dollar, and I suspect with all this changing of the guard, the magazines are trying to go after specific markets and bring in people who are going to specialize," said Tom Fallon, promotion director at Bill Blass Ltd.

"It means renewed competition," said Roberta Garfinkle, VP-director of print media at McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York. "These magazines have not been in good shape in the last year or so."

The competition should heat up in the coming months as the new publishers establish industry contacts and settle into their roles, Ms. Garfinkle said.

"It's very obvious to everybody that Harper's needs to reach out for a bigger share of the market," said Bill Blass' Mr. Fallon. "The size of it speaks for itself. It's certainly the thinnest of the magazines."

"I think Bazaar is holding up pretty well in terms of its share," said Hearst's Mr. Bahrenburg. "I think there is a lot of change going on in the marketplace, and everyone's looking to be in step with that."

Harper's Bazaar has faced an uphill climb since the 1985 launch of Elle, which waged a vigorous campaign to dethrone Vogue as the nation's dominant fashion magazine.

Elle's U.S. edition posted double-digit ad page and circulation gains in its first few years and was one of the fastest-growing consumer magazines ever until its growth rate cooled off in 1989.

Conde Nast responded to Elle's assault in 1988 by naming Anna Wintour to replace Grace Mirabella as editor of Vogue. She's credited with transforming Vogue, which some viewed as stodgy, into a younger, trendier magazine. The addition of Ms. Fuchs was yet another measure designed to solidify Vogue's leadership position.

Vogue remains the largest fashion magazine in terms of paid circulation, though it declined 2.6% to 1,215,767 for the six months ended Dec. 31, compared with year-earlier figures, according to Audit Bureau of Circulations figures.

Elle's circulation rose 1.2% during the same period to 836,556, but newsstand sales dropped a sharp 25.9%. Circulation at Harper's Bazaar increased 1.8% to 749,006 in 1990's second half. □

Liability

dent Jim Joyella. "In an economic environment like this, nobody wants to be left holding the bag and sequential liability greatly enhances the possibilities for confusion and ambiguity as to who has liability at any given point in time."

In response to the agency liability change, member stations had suggested several "knee-jerk responses," including "billing the clients directly and not commissioning the agencies," he said.

The issue of written contract liability isn't as clear for broadcast advertising buys, where transactions are often made without an exchange of paperwork, as it is for print media.

In broadcast buys, it's been the "implicit understanding" between agencies and stations that the conditions of the standard contract apply, calling for sole agency responsibility, Mr. Joyella said.

Those deals may have been "conducted by a handshake or on scraps of paper," he said.

Consequently, he said, it isn't enough for stations to change their liability policies in their contracts, but they must take extra steps to communicate those changes to agencies.

"Because our industry operates without signed contracts, it will be important to notify advertisers, agencies and buying services that your contracts contain this clause," Tim McAuliff, president of TV rep Blair Television, said in a recent memo advising his station clients of the policy change.

"In the event of resistance to the above by an advertiser, agency or buying service, there is an alternative, albeit less ironclad and more cumbersome," Mr. McAuliff recommended to his clients.

This "second-tier approach," would follow the Four A's clause but would allow stations not paid within a specified number of days to notify the advertiser of nonpayment after advising the agency.

"It appears that dual liability is the de facto position of the overwhelming majority of consumer magazines."

That notification would have to include "legally defensible language" that makes it unequivocally clear that the station would then hold the advertiser liable, Mr. McAuliff said.

On the print media side, the Magazine Publishers of America has surveyed 40 of its members, including the 17 largest, to determine their policies on liability, MPA President Donald Kummerfeld said in a recent letter to the Four A's.

Of the 36 members that had official policies, 29 use some form of dual liability while seven espouse sole liability of the agency. Several of those seven companies are in the process of changing to dual liability policies, Mr. Kummerfeld said.

"It appears that dual liability is the de facto position of the overwhelming majority of consumer magazines," he said.

The MPA plans to discuss the issue May 7 at its next board meeting.

However, several magazine publishers have recently accepted insertion orders from agency Wells, Rich, Greene for Continental Airlines' ads containing the sequential liability disclaimer.

In addition to several general business magazines (AA, April 22), Advance Publications' The New Yorker has accepted the buys, but only after receiving assurances from Continental that it had accepted liability.

"The requirement we have asked for is that the insertion order include the authorized signature of an officer of Continental" accepting client liability, said Lynn Guthrie Heiler, associate publisher of The New Yorker.

Ms. Heiler said she believes Conde Nast Publications, a unit of Advance, is "asking for the same thing."

However, Conde Nast executives said the company hasn't received any contracts with sequential liability clauses and hasn't developed a policy for handling them. □

FOR THE RECORD

QUAKER OATS CO., Chicago, named Berry-Brown, Dallas, to succeed J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago, on its estimated $4 million to $5 million rice cake and granola bar account. JWT's only remaining Quaker business is in pet foods, primarily the $10 million Kibbles'n Bits'n Bits'n Bits dog food account.

BRITISH GAS, London, tapped BMP DDB Needham for its consolidated $34.3 million heating, ovens and service products account. Previously, the agency had split the business with Young & Rubicam and Ogilvy & Mather. Y&R had had the greatest share, about $20 million in spending.

LEXMARK INTERNATIONAL, Greenwich, Conn., an IBM Corp. spinoff, named IBM agency Lintas:New York to handle its workstation printers and Lintas' Fahlgren Martin, Parkersburg, W. Va., for its printer and typewriter supplies business. Combined spending is estimated at $20 million.

POLITICAL CANDIDATES would have to put their names and faces on ads targeting opponents under a bill introduced in the North Carolina House of Representatives. The sponsor is Rep. Walter Jones Jr. (D., Pitt County).

"USA TODAY" and United Airlines will team up to promote Major League Baseball's All-Star Game for the next three years. The "USA Today/United Ticket to the All-Stars" promotion will include a radio campaign, point-of-purchase materials and ads in USA Today, USA Today Baseball Weekly and United's Vis-A-Vis in-flight magazine. USA Today handles advertising in-house; Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, is United's agency.

ROBERT MAXWELL'S Maxwell Specialist Magazine on May 16 launches Rock Power, a pan-European rock music magazine in local language editions. The title will be available in seven Western European nations as well as in Hungary and the Soviet Union. Ads via the Leisure Process, London, support. Separately, Maxwell Communication Corp. warned investors that pretax profits for the year ended March 31 will be lower than the $292 million reported a year earlier.

MATTEL AND LUCASARTS Entertainment formed a worldwide partnership to create toys to be marketed by Mattel under the LucasToys trademark. The toys, which at least initially won't be related to any movies from filmmaker George Lucas, will be introduced at the American International Toy Fair next February. Mattel hasn't yet assigned the account.

GLAMOUR, CONDE NAST TRAVELER, Interview and The New Republic won general excellence awards in their circulation classes at the American Society of Magazine Editors' 1991 National Magazine Awards ceremony.

WASHINGTON TIMES CORP. is redesigning and repositioning Insight, its troubled newsweekly. Insight will unveil a new logo and look with its May 6 issue and will shift its editorial focus to investigative journalism and political commentary pieces from coverage and analysis of news events.

CONAGRA, Omaha, Neb., agreed to acquire Golden Valley Microwave Foods, Edina, Minn., in a stock exchange. Golden Valley markets microwave popcorn, french fries and breakfast foods under the Act II name. The companies jointly own Lamb-Weston and have used that venture to develop microwave french fries. Martin/Williams, Minneapolis, handles some projects for Golden Valley, which spent less than $1 million on ads last year.

NEW CAMPAIGNS: Schering-Plough Healthcare Products today breaks a TV spot featuring the Little Miss Coppertone and dog logo. Cadwell Davis Partners, New York, handles. . . . Pizza Hut last week ran a page ad in USA Today announcing it's delivering a free pizza to everyone in the U.S. with the surname Domino, in a jab at Domino's Pizza. A network TV spot supports, via BBDO Worldwide, New York.

ACCOUNT ACTION: Admiral Cruises, Miami, invited eight Southern shops to pitch its $6 million account, resigned by Ryder & Schild after the agency won the $8 million-plus Costa Cruise Lines account. . . . Household Credit Services, Salinas, Calif., to Della Femina, McNamee, Los Angeles, for its $10 million credit card launch in five Midwestern states this fall.

WORTH NOTING: Kentucky Fried Chicken Corp. last week began testing a full breakfast menu in 30 Singapore restaurants. Top kid TV offender: Premiums

By Steven W. Colford

Fast-food marketers and 900-number services most often violate the voluntary guidelines of the National Advertising Division's Children's Advertising Review Unit, a study found.

Still, fewer than 385 of the 10,329 commercials in the study violated the guidelines. The study, commissioned by CARU, was one of the most intensive examinations of children's TV advertising.

Among fast-food advertisers, who accounted for 5.6% of the spots monitored, Burger King Corp. accounted for 83 of the 109 violations. Most of the offending commercials touted premiums.

The study, conducted in February and March 1990, examined a composite week of children's programming on three affiliates of the Big 3 networks, two independent broadcasters and two cable channels, USA Network and Nickelodeon. The study looked at 604 hours of programming. Previous studies drew from only about 60 to 80 hours of programming per week.

The single most prevalent violation was devoting virtually an entire commercial message to information about a premium. Such an action is against a CARU guideline that spots must emphasize products.

The study counted 73 CARU guideline violations by 900-number advertisers, though it noted that some telephone-service spots were included in other groupings where the advertiser combined the phone service with a product commercial.

Among strictly phone service spots, commercials to call an Easter Bunny were guilty of 20 guideline violations, the study found, while game information for Nintendo of America was named in 14 violations and Mattel's He-Man in 13.

Lewis Galoob Toys had 34 violations, the most of any toy marketer. The company recently agreed to discontinue certain claims for its Micro Machine toys under pressure from the Federal Trade Commission, which cited the company for false and deceptive advertising.

The study also found advertiser compliance with the guidelines was greatest on network stations, where only 2% of the monitored spots were in violation, compared with 3.7% on independent stations and 5% on cable.

USA Network had the highest percentage of commercials in violation, 8%.

The study also showed that the number of commercials per hour of programming on broadcast and cable is already well below the recent limits established by Congress.

Cable showed the least amount of advertising per hour in children's programming, 6 minutes, 48 seconds. The independents registered 9 minutes, 37 seconds, while network affiliates had 10 minutes, 5 seconds.

New rules that take effect Oct. 1 limit commercials in children's programming to 10½ minutes per hour during weekdays and 12 minutes an hour on weekends.

Peggy Charren, president of Action for Children's Television, said the study should have been conducted during the pre-Christmas months to show the true measure of the amount of commercials during children's programming. She also questioned the study's reliance on the average number of commercials instead of the actual number.

"Using the average is like saying that everyone drives an average of 35 mph, when they actually drive 10 mph sometimes and 55 other times," she said.

The study analyzed 16,024 non-program messages, including commercials, public service announcements, educational messages and program promotions.

If all the non-program messages are counted, then independent TV stations—frequent targets for advocates of tighter control over advertising directed to children—averaged the least amount of programming per hour, 46 minutes, 34 seconds, compared with 47 minutes, 51 seconds for network affiliates and 49 minutes, 22 seconds for cable.

The results showed "our guidelines are being met quite successfully," said CARU VP Arthur Pober.

"I think it's quite good that 95% or 96% of ads were in compliance, though that doesn't mean that we should relax," he said.

Mr. Pober noted the increase in "kids' clubs" from marketers as diverse as Toys "R" Us to Burger King, and said that surge might lead CARU to reassess its guidelines in that area.

"They run the gamut from being sound and responsible to having no focus and not delineating to the kids what they should expect," he said. "Our guides say that these clubs should let kids be aware of what, if anything, they are getting by being a member or whether it's just another way of selling kids another premium.

"Sometimes these programs just generate lists of names. . . . that then are promulgated all over the place. And with today's technology, that has considerably larger ramifications."

Independent and cable channels presented a slightly higher proportion of ads featuring contests than did network affiliates.

The study also found independent stations were far more likely than network affiliates or cable to feature programming that lacked separations between programs and commercials. Separators, required by the Federal Communications Commission, are intended to help children differentiate between programs and ads. □

Ads in violation of NAD guidelines

Out of 10,329 commercials viewed, fewer than 385 were in violation of the voluntary guidelines. Fast-food and 900-number services produced the largest number of violations.

FDA embraces tougher stance

there's plenty more to come."

"It would be prudent for the rest of the food industry to pay close attention to what's gone on here," said Jeff Nesbit, the FDA's associate commissioner for public affairs.

"The agency expects any and every company to make sure that its labeling is consistent with FDA policy, which has been in place for several decades. And if they don't, and if the FDA finds out about it, then those companies can expect similar action."

"David Kessler has said the FDA will be looking at court actions to a greater extent than in the past to establish its bona fides" and to make the point that "the new commissioner . . . means business," said Ed Dunkelberger, general counsel for the National Food Processors Association.

"One thing this act will do is get the food companies' attention and have them factor into their marketing equations the likelihood that FDA enforcement action is a real possibility if they violate regulation," he said.

"Such a strong penalty signals a new direction and difference from his immediate predecessors at the FDA," said Wally Snyder, exec VP of the American Advertising Federation. "Dr. Kessler certainly intends to send a message of aggressive regulation. . . . whether for food labeling or drug advertising."

That refers to Dr. Kessler's hard-line statements recently before a congressional committee hearing concerning direct-to-consumer advertising of prescription drugs.

"This act will . . . get the food companies' attention and have them factor into their marketing equations the likelihood that FDA enforcement action is a real possibility if they violate regulation."

In a March appearance before the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee, Dr. Kessler stressed the importance he attaches to making sure prescription drug advertisers stay within federal boundaries.

"Most firms in the industry want to adhere to our regulations, but they are waiting for us to take appropriate actions," he said. "There is not a level playing field out there. It is clear to me that some in the prescription drug industry have gone over the line."

Dr. Kessler's bold move last week is seen in the broadest of terms by Wayne Pines, a former FDA associate commissioner who's now a prominent player in the field of drug advertising as exec VP at Burson-Marsteller.

"The agency has been perceived as weak in enforcement for the past decade, and Kessler feels that the agency, if it wants to enhance its credibility, needs more enforcement," Mr. Pines said. "The decision by the agency to seize product has less to do with the specifics of the ['fresh'] case than with how the agency intends to operate, and that when negotiations fail, it will take action."

"The enforcement world at the FDA is changing, and that means the FDA's patience will wear thinner than in the past," said Nancy Buc, partner at the Washington law firm of Weil, Gotshal & Manges and a former FDA chief counsel. This action "fits exactly into what Kessler has been saying about there being some point at which the agency will stop talking."

Ragu Foods and Citrus World are two marketers pondering the FDA action.

Both Ragu and Citrus World have been involved in discussions with the FDA over their using the term "fresh" in product names. Ragu has been trading letters with the federal agency since mid-1989 over its Ragu Fresh Italian Brand pasta sauce while Citrus World, which markets Fresh 'N Natural, has been cited by the FDA as being in violation of its regulations.

Citrus World recently changed its packaging to include the word "brand" in its Fresh 'N Natural logo and printed the word "pasteurized" in a bigger typeface on its label.

After the seizure, but before the P&G capitulation, both companies said they were sticking by their labeling.

The FDA's possible next targets for enforcement may be food marketers using descriptive terms such as "light," "90% fat-free" and other nutrition/health claims, said Bruce Silverglade, director-legal projects at the Center for Science in the Public Interest and a longtime advocate of increased FDA labeling scrutiny.

"Many food companies were upset with P&G's claims—Tropicana, for one—so this shows that the FDA responds to concerns of the consumers and of industry," he said.

"Most food companies know the [nutrition labeling] rules that will be coming out by 1993," he said, "and hopefully, this seizure will make food companies think twice. . . . about claims they know to be false and misleading."

The FDA's action was applauded by Robert Abrams, the New York attorney general who's spearheaded several state enforcement actions against food marketers.

"The federal giant has awakened from a long sleep to join the battle against the enormous problem of deceptive and misleading packaging," he said last week. "We at the state level who've had to be on the front lines of this fight with limited resources would welcome the help of a newly aggressive FDA, and so would the nation's consumers." □ misleading since it represents and suggests that the articles are fresh when, in fact, they are not fresh but have been produced from concentrate."

P&G

The FDA's decision to seize Citrus Hill Fresh Choice prompted P&G to seek a settlement.

"We believe our product is properly labeled, but the controversy surrounding this issue, including the FDA's unusual seizure action, has simply made it impossible from a business standpoint to continue to use the term 'fresh' on our brand," said company spokeswoman Wendy Jacques.

Earlier in the week, P&G had told the FDA it would drop the word "fresh" from its label but the company wanted assurances other marketers would also have to comply. P&G said more than 500 grocery products use the term "fresh" on their labels.

The FDA apparently wouldn't give formal assurances about future enforcement against other marketers, so talks broke down—resulting in the seizure action.

People close to those talks, however, believe the FDA won't stop with P&G. Also on the "fresh" hot seat are Citrus World for its Fresh 'N Natural orange juice and Chesebrough-Pond's for Ragu Foods' Ragu Fresh Italian Brand pasta sauce. The two marketers are already in discussions with the FDA over "fresh" labels.

Neither of those companies could be reached for comment on the P&G/FDA settlement late Friday.

"We had expected that how the term 'fresh' could be used would be clarified through the rulemaking process that would apply to everyone. But the FDA chose to bring action against P&G instead of dealing with the issue through rulemaking," Ms. Jacques said.

In the settlement, however, P&G addressed all of the FDA's labeling concerns, she said.

Now, P&G will focus on how to market Citrus Hill under its shortened—and original—name. New packaging will start to appear on store shelves in late May.

N W Ayer, New York, Citrus Hill's ad agency, is working now to create new advertising that will reflect packaging changes.

The challenge will be to formulate a new positioning for Citrus Hill, which had hoped to gain share through its "fresh" relaunch. P&G last year restaged what was by then Citrus Hill Select by calling the reformulated product Citrus Hill Fresh Choice.

That move was viewed as a way to compete against premium not-from-concentrate orange juices marketed by Coca-Cola Foods (Minute Maid) and Seagram Co.'s Tropicana Products, the top two rivals in the $3.1 billion orange juice category.

Almost immediately, questions came up over the use of the term "fresh" for a juice from concentrate—questions raised by regulators, consumer groups and competitors.

Despite the relaunch and accompanying ad campaign, Citrus Hill Fresh Choice is a distant No. 3 and has continued to lose market share. It dropped to an 8% share for the 52-week period ending March 23 from a 9.8% share for the 52-week period ending May 19, before last year's repositioning.

"P&G's real problem here is that they haven't been able to convince consumers that Citrus Hill is on the same level as Minute Maid and Tropicana," said Tom Pirko, president of Bevmark, a management consultancy. "The attitude in Cincinnati [P&G's headquarters] is that you have to differentiate products to make them unique. That works well if a product can be engineered, but it doesn't necessarily work with orange juice."

Analysts question how much longer P&G Chairman-CEO Edwin L. Artzt will hold onto Citrus Hill, which had sales of about $280 million last year and is said to be breaking even at best.

"What's so amazing about Citrus Hill is that it is everything that P&G isn't," said Andrew Shore, analyst at Prudential Securities. "That's why this FDA situation is good news. It's narrowed Ed Artzt's time frame. He'll be less patient. . . .

"One of the biggest strategic issues is the cost of revamping Citrus Hill, how long to stay with it to determine success and how to measure success. P&G is in a new-product cycle, and the last thing it wants to do is divert time and resources to a brand that's not No. 1 or No. 2."

Still, P&G appears committed to the Citrus Hill brand. The company is testing in San Diego Citrus Hill 10, a vitamin-enriched juice drink aimed at children, and also is selling cut-up fruit under the Citrus Hill brand in East Coast markets and Citrus Hill Fresh Fruit through direct mail. □

K-III

Mr. Murdoch had been trying to sell along with the other magazines, was excluded from the K-III sale.

"It was not the right magazine for us, and Murdoch was willing to keep it," Mr. Reilly said.

A News Corp. spokesman said Mr. Murdoch plans to continue to operate the upstart women's fashion magazine, which isn't profitable. Industry sources speculate Mr. Murdoch might eventually sell or fold Mirabella rather than continue to absorb its losses.

The magazines in the agreement are: Automobile, European Travel & Life, New Woman, New York Magazine, Premiere, Seventeen, Soap Opera Digest and Soap Opera Weekly.

Mr. Reilly said the Daily Racing Form, believed to have made about $25 million last year, and Soap Opera Digest, believed to have made $15 million, are the gems of the group "financially," while Seventeen and New York Magazine are the strongest "franchise properties."

The $650 million purchase price is about 10 times cash flow, described by industry observers as "a good deal for both sides" considering the current weak market in the magazine industry.

"It gives K-III a chance to get into the consumer end lock, stock and barrel. You pay a little premium to do that," said one magazine executive.

"We did around 10 times earnings which, for franchise properties, I think is cheap," Mr. Reilly said. "If this were 1988, we would've paid 50% more than we did."

"What this shows is that quality properties will still sell at premium multiples," said Drew Marcus, VP at investment banker Henry Ansbacher Inc. "The lack of quality properties on the market recently exaggerated the low multiples."

Mr. Reilly, who will likely serve as ceo of the publishing group, said he plans to preserve most of the current management ranks at the corporate level and at individual titles.

However, he said he will replace Murdoch Magazines President Les Hinton, a longtime News Corp. employee who's expected to remain with that organization in some capacity.

Mr. Reilly said he expects to name a new president in the coming weeks. There are several candidates in mind, he said, adding that the person chosen will be someone "from the magazine industry and with excellent managerial skills."

K-III will vastly expand the magazine group's corporate ad sales efforts, Mr. Reilly said.

"Bill Reilly and [K-III President] Charles McCurdy are good, sound operating guys," said one media consultant.

Messrs. Reilly and McCurdy are former Macmillan executives who formed K-III in January 1989 as a partnership with Kohlberg Kravis Roberts. The company completed nine acquisitions in its first two years, primarily trade magazine publishers, such as Intertec Publishing Corp., and book club operations.

Last March, K-III acquired encyclopedia publisher Funk & Wagnalls and the Weekly Reader Corp. from Field Publications.

K-III's challenge is to "run [the titles] as a company, which means higher revenues and lower costs," the consultant said. "It's not a publishing company now, it's a collection of magazines."

K-III might, for example, consolidate the magazines' printing operations with World Color Press, the nation's largest printer of consumer magazines, also controlled by Kohlberg. Two of the titles, Premiere and New Woman, are printed there. □

Coen: Little ad growth

Industry forecaster sees recovery at yearend

By Robert J. Coen

U.S. advertising expenditures are expected to rise between 3% and 4% in 1991, down from the previous forecast of 4.6%.

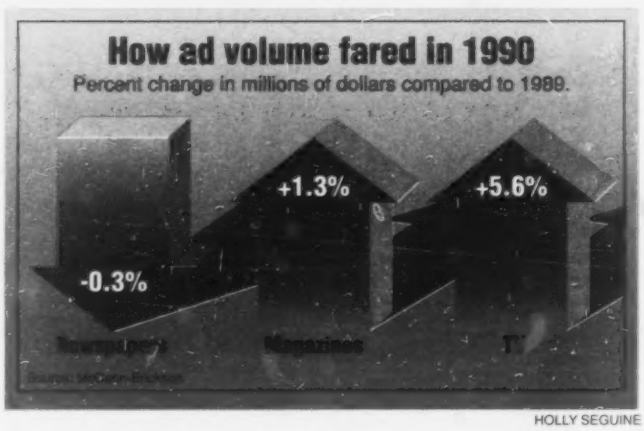
The revision is a result of reduced ad growth showing up in the final figures for 1990 and the continued economic slump.

Expenditures should exceed $132 billion this year but aren't likely to reach the $136 billion forecast last December.

The final ad expenditures for 1990 showed 3.8% growth instead of the 4.9% gain estimated earlier. When final fourth-quarter results from all media were released, it was apparent ad budgets were sharply trimmed in the closing months of the year as a result of the Mideast situation and the beginning of the recession.

Budgets grew less than the 4.1% overall rate of inflation.

As for 1991, extremely gloomy reports from most local media during the opening months indicate local ad growth for the full year will probably be just barely up from 1990. The outlook for national ad budget growth is better.



HOLLY SEGUINE

The slowdown and disruptions of the early months will delay the previously expected stronger recovery. Ad spending levels in many media may lag behind year-ago levels until past the middle of 1991.

The bottom will eventually be reached; by Christmas, things should be getting much better. By the closing quarter, we expect national advertising activity to be well above 1990 levels.

Traps set for Olympic ambush ads

By Joe Mandese

The International Olympic Committee plans to ambush the ambushers.

Using an arsenal of tricks including "public embarrassment" and the confiscation of Olympics tickets, the IOC hopes to dissuade so-called ambush marketers from running unauthorized advertising and promotions that falsely convey authorized support of the Games.

To discourage such promotions, the committee said it will hold news conferences and run ads alerting consumers of the attempted tie-ins.

The IOC is taking these steps because the tactic is threatening to undermine support from official Olympic sponsors who pay considerable fees for the association.

For 1992, 12 companies have paid fees totaling more than $200 million to be exclusive worldwide category sponsors of the Winter and Summer Games.

"It's very important that the IOC protects these interests, because the Olympics are not government funded," said Michael Payne, IOC director of marketing. "If companies feel they can build Olympics programs without supporting the Games, then why would any sponsor agree to spend millions of dollars to support the Olympics?"

Anti-ambush techniques were used successfully by the Australian Olympic Team in 1988. It ridiculed McDonald's Corp. for an unauthorized promotion in Australia tied to the Seoul Summer Olympics. McDonald's Australian sales reportedly plummeted, and the chain subsequently signed a sponsorship deal with the Australian team.

The IOC hopes to avoid such

Pepsi to 'Chill Out' this summer

SOMERS, N.Y.—Pepsi-Cola Co. this week will unveil a "Summer Chill Out" promotional program, sources said. The plan includes a car giveaway, special packaging and a credit-style card for teens. The program involves a national rollout of Pepsi-Cola's "License to Chill" program tested last year in Texas, said sources close to the company. A "License to Chill" card allowed young Pepsi drinkers to win prizes such as airline tickets and discounts at local retailers. The company wouldn't comment on its summer marketing plans. Clorox's identity crisis

Company stumbles as it tries to diversify product lines

By Bradley Johnson

Clorox Co., laboring for two decades to be more than a bleach marketer, is facing a midlife crisis.

Sales of its namesake product, chlorine bleach, are flat. Clorox 2, its second-biggest profit contributor, may be made obsolete by powder detergents with bleach, an area where Clorox is bombing.

Also, Clorox's latest attempts at new products—bar soap, frozen dinners and a $169 barbecue grill—are likely to go nowhere, analysts say.

"The company is going through an identity crisis," said Andrew Shore, an analyst with Prudential Securities. "It's juggling too many things at the same time, hoping the success of one will point it in the right direction."

Clorox is fully capable of emerging from this crisis, industry analysts say. Their advice: Cut the losses in detergent, abandon a few of the

Consumers target ire at data bases

By Scott Hume

The stampede to develop targeted marketing programs using data bases may be running into a wall of consumer resistance.

In a new Gallup Organization survey of attitudes about the amount and kinds of information marketers may be gathering, conducted for Advertising Age, consumers said they would shun companies that sell information about their buying habits.

Many consumers are uneasy about being known too well as the gathering, selling and buying of information about brand preferences and buying habits accelerates. Advertisers are looking to move away from mass marketing to target only potential product users.

GALLUP SURVEY

The Gallup study asked 1,005 adults whether they're concerned about how much information may have been gathered about them without their knowledge. Nearly half (45%) the respondents described themselves as "very concerned" about what marketers may know about them; 33% said they're "somewhat concerned."

Only 21% said they're unconcerned.

Respondents ages 55 or older, and those in the lowest income bracket (less than $20,000 annually), showed the highest levels of anxiety about information gathering.

"Direct marketers need to explain better what they're doing. If they don't, consumers can be turned off," said Ted Spiegel, who retired in 1987 as senior VP-marketing and advertising for catalog retailer Spiegel.

"If they can explain it correctly, so that consumers see how they are benefited, then direct marketing can avoid the backlash," said Mr. Spiegel, who's now president of Spiegel Marketing Associates and an associate professor in the direct marketing program at Northwestern University's Medill School of Journalism.

Some companies have already felt the backlash, however. Lotus Development Corp. in February dropped plans to develop MarketPlace:Households after it got 30,000 complaints about the proposed data-base software with addresses and demographic information on 80 million U.S. households.

Blockbuster Entertainment Corp. also heard from angry consumers in January, when one of its executives was quoted in The Wall Street Journal as saying the 1,500-store video chain might sell information about consumers' video rentals to direct marketers.

The company quickly disowned the statement and said it had no plans to sell the information it has. And results of this Gallup survey suggest the video chain was right not to embrace the idea.

Gallup respondents were asked whether they would still patronize a video rental store if they learned that store or chain was selling information about their rental habits. Three-quarters of the sample (76%) said they would take their business elsewhere; 18% said they would stay with the same rental store. The rest either said they don't rent videos (5%) or had no opinion (1%).

Respondents with the highest incomes and most education were most likely to say they would boycott a video renter that sold information about them. On the earlier question, these groups had shown lower-than-average concern about the amount of information being gathered on them.

"Data-base marketing is in its infancy; it's just starting to address the question of how it will use the information it has," Mr. Spiegel said. "It has a way to go in explaining itself completely and correctly."

The Gallup survey was taken by telephone among a randomly selected, nationally projectable group of adults. It was conducted during March and has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1%. □

Network malaise

Ad execs ponder rash of high-level defections

By Joe Mandese

Key network TV executives are bolting for greener pastures, either in Hollywood or with advertising agencies, leaving observers wondering whether the nets have lost their stuff.

The biggest move occurred last week when NBC Entertainment Chairman Brandon Tartikoff, largely credited as the architect of NBC's long run in the No. 1 ratings position, announced he was leaving to become chairman of Paramount Pictures.

"Symbolically, it's a very significant thing because Brandon is the last of the living legends of network television programming success," said Gordon Link, worldwide media director for McCann-Erickson USA, New York, and a former ABC network executive.

"Not only was he very talented, but he was the visual representation of NBC to both the creative and advertising community," said Arnie Semsky, exec VP-director of media and programming services at BBDO Worldwide.

Mr. Tartikoff's departure was preceded by defections last month of key CBS sales executives Jerry Dominus and Bob Silberberg to the agency side.

"While each one of these individuals moved for specific reasons, the fact is, they are leaving an industry that is not quite as king of the hill as it used to be. And that's got to be part of the equation," said Mike Moore, worldwide media director at D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles.

The fragmentation of the TV business is leading to a dilution of more than just network ratings, said Jerry Solomon, VP-general manager of Anheuser-Busch's Busch Media Group.

B. Tartikoff

"Some of the old guard are starting to move on," he said, "and I don't think they have a wealth of young talent that is coming up to replace them, because it is so spread out among cable, syndication and other entities. And they're paying as much, if not more."

Others believe these moves are a harbinger of more fundamental changes to come. News of Mr. Tartikoff's departure has fueled speculation of network downsizing that began circulating when the Federal Communications Commission modified the network financial interest and syndication rules last month. The rules continue to restrict the networks' ability to own and syndicate programming.

According to the rumors, networks could bypass

Phone, cable venture offers movie smorgasbord

By Joe Mandese

An unusual cooperative venture between the telephone and cable TV industries could transform the conventional TV set into a multiplex movie theater.

This fall, three major companies join forces to begin testing VCTV, or viewer controlled television, a new pay-per-view technology that can be used on demand.

AT&T Co., US West and the nation's largest cable TV operator, Tele-Communications Inc., will equip about 450 households in TCI's Denver cable system with VCTV. With the push of a button, the system's viewers will have access to thousands of films any time they want.

With the push of a button, the system's viewers will have access to thousands of films any time they want.

Consumers participating in the test will pay no access fees and films ordered through VCTV will be priced "competitively" with rented videos. The test is scheduled to run through mid-1993, but a broad-based rollout of the technology isn't expected until the late '90s.

Agency and TV industry executives believe new technologies such as VCTV could accelerate both the penetration and use of pay-per-view, further fragmenting the TV medium.

To date, pay-per-view has offered relatively little access for advertisers. With few exceptions, pay-per-view programming doesn't accept advertising and

7-Eleven ready for ad comeback

New Japanese owners provide cash boost

By Christy Fisher

DALLAS--Southland Corp.'s 7-Eleven convenience store chain, pumped up with a $430 million cash infusion, has begun a "real people" ad campaign that pushes its fast-food products.

The nation's No. 1 convenience store chain emerged from Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization in March and is now running two new TV spots in 10 markets nationwide that expand on its "Sign of the times" campaign.

The new spots from J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago, are sung in a folksy narrative and tell the story of two 7-Eleven franchisees, Rick Fournier of Toledo, Ohio, and Diane Conlan of Ocean Beach, Calif.

Mr. Fournier, an avid baseball fan, helps the chain pitch Big Bite hot dogs. Ms. Conlan, whose store is in a seaside community known as "Dog Beach," pushes Big Gulp soft drinks.

"This [campaign] brings store people into the picture as part of the 7-Eleven difference," said Marva Cathey, Southland's national advertising manager.

This is 7-Eleven's folksy tale of Diane Conlan and her friends at "Dog Beach," Calif.

Southland is expected to be a more aggressive advertiser now that Tokyo-based Ito-Yokado and its Seven-Eleven Japan subsidiary have bought a 70% stake in the company.

After a flat year, Southland is expected to increase ad spending by 7.1% to $75 million in 1991, an October prospectus revealed.

JWT handles Southland's image advertising, while W.B. Doner & Co., Southfield, Mich., does tactical marketing. Camelot Communications, Dallas, handles media buying.

The sale shifts control of the company to the Japanese from the founding Thompson family, but analysts don't expect major strategy changes since most of Southland's senior management remains in place. Clark Matthews II, 54, became president-ceo in March, from chief financial officer, succeeding Jere W. Thompson Jr., who remains on the board.

The cash infusion and debt restructuring should allow the company to proceed with some changes that were on hold because of the cash crunch. Those changes include remodeling and remerchandising of stores as well as expansion of fast-food offerings.

"Southland's focus has been more on cash flow," said Chris Vroom, VP at Alex. Brown & Sons. "Now, they can focus on the competition and driving sales."

Southland is also expected to adopt some of its Japanese counterparts' successes.

Ito-Yokado is the second-largest and most profitable superstore/supermarket chain operator in Japan. Seven-Eleven Japan, 50.3% owned by Ito-Yokado, is Japan's largest convenience store operator with more than 4,200 stores.

The Seven-Eleven Japan stores are equipped with a sophisticated point-of-purchase tracking system that lets managers know how each item is selling and its profitability. Ito-Yokado has been discussing the installation of this system in Southland's U.S. stores.

"One of the problems of the convenience store industry is the lack" of such equipment, said Dennis Telzrow, an analyst with Eppler, Guerin & Turner. "They've [retailers] got to have it. I don't think any major retailer will survive without it."

Southland's 6,500 stores reported sales of $8.4 billion for 1990, up 0.6% from the previous year. There was a net loss of $276.6 million for the year, compared with a $1.3 billion loss in 1989. □ ing spending during the first quarter of 1991 was 147, significantly below the year-ago level, and below the average level for all of last year.

The index level is expected to gradually move up and, by the fourth quarter, should be dramtically higher than the 141 index for the fourth quarter of 1990.

Most of the gloom hanging over the advertising industry will be gone by yearend, and optimistic forecasts for 1992 will be abundant.

Economic recovery, some pent-up consumer demand, the political elections and the Olympics should finally fuel a noticeable re-expansion in advertising that could continue for most of the rest of the decade.

As for 1990, it's now evident many retailers virtually canceled their regular holiday-season selling efforts. That came on top of severely depressed local ad spending during the first three quarters, caused by poor regional economies and the heavy debt of many large retailers.

With a rise of just 1.7% compared with 1989, local ad volume did even worse than most people thought possible last year.

Newspapers, the largest local medium, experienced their worst year since 1961. The ad woes brought about by the retail slump were made worse by declines in many classified help-wanted and real estate ads.

Other local media did only slightly better.

The worsening economy and the uncertainties in the Mideast also had a negative impact on national advertising in the closing months of '90. Fourth-quarter commitments to the three major TV networks made in earlier upfront buying softened.

Other national media also experienced reductions in traditional levels of spending, as many marketers cut back on their usual level of holiday promotional efforts and as the lag between the economic slowdown and ad appropriations finally caught up with many budgets.

National advertising rose 5.5% in 1990, slightly outpacing the 5.1% gain for the gross national product.

Among the noticeable pullbacks in traditional holiday budgets, ads for toys, perfumes, expensive watches and cameras were far below previous levels.

The interruption of improved trends in national advertising is temporary, however. The only question is when the improving trends will clearly reappear, and the greatest likelihood appears to be in the fourth quarter. □

Stouffer couldn't find the right path for Right Course's advertising. The first installment focused on the brand's health benefits, with quick shots of various entrees, but it didn't build sufficient sales.

How Stouffer's Right Course veered off course

Everything pointed in favor of brand and still it flopped

By Judann Dagnoli

Stouffer Foods Corp.'s Right Course frozen entree line, introduced in September 1989, seemed to have everything going for it.

Right Course's low-fat, low-cholesterol, low-sodium positioning dovetailed perfectly with the fast-growing wellness movement.

The brand had a respectable $20 million marketing budget, and Stouffer—the creator of 1980s brand powerhouse Lean Cuisine—had a good track record in "healthy" foods.

But 17 months later, despite a reformulation, repackaging and rehaul of Right Course's advertising, the brand held only a 1.1% share of the frozen dinner and entree market. Conceding defeat, the company pulled Right Course from national distribution in February.

Stouffer redesigned the Right Course package, adding green and moving the nutrition label to the back.

What went wrong?

Food industry experts and competitors say Stouffer was trying so hard not to cannibalize its successful Lean Cuisine entree line that it erred in Right Course's positioning.

To make it stand apart from Lean Cuisine, the company priced Right Course too high, shelved it in the wrong section of the freezer case, made the brand's varieties too exotic and its advertising too unfocused, sources say.

"It really was an amazing case of doing just about all the critical things wrong," says a senior executive of a competing food company.

When Right Course was first introduced, there were 11 items in the line, including sesame chicken, beef dijon and fiesta beef with corn pasta. The product was packaged in a beige box with a very prominent "nutritional color bar" measuring each entree's fat, cholesterol and sodium levels.

Stouffer executives also pushed for Right Course shelving in the frozen dinner section, near ConAgra's Healthy Choice, even though the product was marketed in entree form only.

"They backed it pretty hard through their brokers in the dinner section so that it wouldn't cannibalize Lean Cuisine," says another executive at a frozen food company.

Another competitor says the strategy backfired when Stouffer found frozen dinner consumers don't buy entrees.

Ed Marra, senior VP-marketing at Stouffer, disagrees.

"Between dinners and entrees there is a fair amount of overlap," he says. "Perhaps dinners are more male skewed, but in many freezers both entrees and dinners are shelved so they flow together. I wouldn't say [Right Course's shelving] is a critical point."

Right Course's $12 million ad campaign, from Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago, was themed "Entrees for healthier living" and played heavily on the notion of Right Course being a healthy alternative "to dishes you thought you might have to give up."

But in the first half of 1990, the brand managed to achieve only a 2% share of the $2.7 billion frozen dinner and entree market, according to Information Resources Inc.'s InfoScan service data.

Meanwhile, Healthy Choice's share moved to 10% in the second quarter from 8% in the first quarter.

Stouffer then switched gears in spring 1990, repackaging the brand with a dark green background—Healthy Choice's signature color—and a wide swath of coral, Stouffer's familiar shade.

Mr. Marra says the original packaging was a mistake.

"It didn't have adequate shelf impact and didn't communicate the [product's] benefits clearly," he says.

Competitors say the green was clearly adopted to enable Stouffer to ride the coattails of Healthy Choice's success. Mr. Marra denies it: "Green communicates fresh," he says.

In the repackaging, Stouffer also greatly de-emphasized the nutritional bar, which another competitor described as "a hospital menu," moving it to the back side of the package and decreasing its size.

Mr. Marra says the back-side label was more user-friendly, and he defends the nutritional bar because it gave consumers "a sense of where the product fits in with their daily requirements."

Along with the repackaging, Stouffer cut prices and downscaled its fare. Foods such as lasagna replaced beef ragout.

The company also dropped its taste-driven ad campaign to use a celebrity approach. Tatham-Laird & Kudner developed a new campaign with golfer Arnold Palmer in TV and print that promoted fitness and was themed: "Get on the right course for life."

But even this campaign backfired, according to some industry insiders who say consumers already associated the celebrity approach with Healthy Choice. That brand's advertising, created by Campell-Mithun-Esty, Minneapolis, features actress Diahann Carroll and actor Michael Gross.

County NatWest Securities USA analyst Tim Ramey says Stouffer's ad campaign couldn't compete with Healthy Choice's main spokesman, ConAgra Chairman-CEO Mike Harper, who candidly discussed his heart attack in some of the spots.

"He's a great spokesman with great credibility," Mr. Ramey says. "He has a down-home folksiness."

He adds that Stouffer "didn't support Right Course as aggressively" as ConAgra in promotional spending.

Despite Stouffer's efforts, Right Course's market share continued to slip. In the third quarter of 1990, IRI data show, Right Course dropped to a 1% share of the frozen dinner and entree market, remaining at that level in the fourth quarter.

Worse, Stouffer's fears were realized: Lean Cuisine was losing share. The brand went from a 9% share in the first and second quarters to 8% in the third quarter and 7% in the fourth.

Stouffer was forced to pull the Right Course line.

"This brand ended up competing with our Lean Cuisine line," said Stouffer President E. Michael Moone in a statement issued at the time.

In retrospect, Mr. Marra says, "As to whether we did everything wrong, it's pretty hard to answer that. I think instead that we learned. When you attempt to innovate there's a higher risk factor. Where there's no risk, there's no innovation."

He says Right Course had one fundamental problem—its name.

"It didn't communicate well, and the more [stock-keeping units] in the freezer the more you need a good name to explain the concept," he says. □

Learning to 'suffer' with Lean Cuisine

Stouffer Foods Corp. is relying on its Lean Cuisine brand as the engine to drive its healthy-foods sales.

The company has reformulated the 34 entrees to reduce sodium, fat and cholesterol. The brand is now at least 95% fat free, contains 30% or less calories from fat and has less than 600 milligrams of sodium and cholesterol.

After pulling Right Course, Stouffer focused on building Lean Cuisine as a low-fat, low-cholesterol product.

Most prices also have been reduced to about $1.89—similar to Kraft General Foods' Budget Gourmet—from about $2.79, says Ed Marra, Stouffer senior VP-marketing.

"Now, we have nothing over $3, and most of our entrees are under $2," he says.

A new national TV ad campaign, from Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago, is running for the "new" Lean Cuisine. According to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service, Stouffer spent $13.1 million advertising Lean Cuisine last year.

The 30-second spot features a man and woman reclining in a hammock on what appears to be a tropical island. While they lounge, the announcer says, "These people are in a total panic over their daily intake of fat, sodium and cholesterol. Look how they suffer." The theme is "The taste you can love for life."

The new campaign is designed "to show that consumers bombarded with health claims can satisfy those needs easily with Lean Cuisine," Mr. Marra says.

That's a lesson Stouffer learned the hard way.

Making a name for selves

Store brands proving stiff competition for marketers

By Julie Liesse

When Dominick's Finer Foods, a leading Chicago-area supermarket chain, advertises "The better name brand," it's not referring to Kellogg, Heinz, Stouffer or Kraft.

For Dominick's and other major supermarket chains, the better name brand they refer to more and more often is their own.

Store brands, or private-label products, are not new—supermarkets have offered their own dairy products, canned vegetables and pet foods for years.

But when store brands become the fastest-growing player in a heavily marketed category such as ready-to-eat cereal—as they did last year—the packaged-foods industry takes notice.

Store brands racked up sales of $21.6 billion in 1989, according to Information Resources Inc. Also, store brands are growing dramatically in areas where national brands traditionally dominate.

"Every major retailer in the U.S. now has a major store-brand program—with high-visibility graphics, quality sourcing, new and innovative products," says Brian Sharoff, president of the Private Label Manufacturers Association. The association says store brands at the top 41 U.S. retailers and wholesalers accounted for 18.2% of sales last year, compared with 17.7% in 1989.

In the $7.2 billion cereal category, store brands last year represented 7% of pound volume, double the 3.5% chalked up in '87.

"We recognize private label is a real threat. These brands go after the leaders in a category," says Kellogg Co. Chairman-CEO William LaMothe.

Kellogg has reacted by holding the line on price increases for some of its key brands, including Kellogg's Corn Flakes.

Likewise, sales of private-label cheese created one of Kraft General Foods' few sore spots last year.

"We lost share points to private-label cheese last year," Chairman-CEO Michael Miles told analysts in February. "Through the 1980s, private label was flat to down in most of our categories. But in recent times, we've seen some surges in private label."

Mr. Sharoff offers reasons for store brands' strength.

"First, the demise of TV as a dominant traffic-builder for products has hurt mass-marketed national brands," he says. "Second, coupons have backfired on national manufacturers."

Timothy Ramey, food industry analyst with County NatWest Securities USA, says pricing has been a factor as well.

"In categories that have seen huge price increases, like cereal, national manufacturers have left a big price umbrella. With lower-price, but good quality private-label products, the consumer has a meaningful choice," he says.

Perhaps most important, Mr. Sharoff says, "With consolidation and management changes in the supermarket industry, these retailers now view themselves as marketers."

Dominick's, for example, just this year discontinued its Heritage House line of products in favor of a Dominick's brand that ranges from coffee filters to English muffins and shampoo. With bright graphics and a prominent place in TV and newspaper ads, the "better name brand" is being merchandised on shelves as well as a national brand.

Now the cutting edge for store brands is the "superbrand"—store brands that transcend individual retailers. Toronto's Loblaws chain has created a President's Choice brand that is sold by D'Agostino's in New York City and Bell's in Buffalo, N.Y.

Some store brands also have been able to innovate faster than national marketers. The first refrigerated yogurt with NutraSweet came from Kroger Co.; store brands also have been on top of the low-fat, low-sodium trend with ice creams and prepared vegetables.

Although the store brand concept has been put in place over the last five years, some say the current recession may give store brands even more momentum.

Store brands generally sell better during a recession, says Richard Furash, national director-consumer products for Deloitte & Touche, a package-goods industry consultant.

"In the last recession, consumers tried generics and found the quality wasn't up to that of national brands. But this time, what may happen is consumers may try the new and improved store brands because of their prices, and stick with the products for their quality," Mr. Furash says. □

IN TODAY'S ECONOMIC TIMES, SMART MARKETERS ARE LOOKING UP.

That's because they've discovered the In-Store Advertising Network. The timely and direct way to reach their most important audience: The American Shopper.

Our electronic signs hang throughout the store to catch consumers' eyes where two out of three purchasing decisions are made – right at point of sale.

So far, we've helped over 200 brands from 70 major advertisers boost sales by an average of +29%.

You'll find us where you need us, in thousands of stores representing over 60 leading supermarket chains across the country. Including A&P, Schnuck's, Bruno's, Giant, Von's, Pathmark, Kroger, and Winn-Dixie, to name a few.

So if you're finding it harder to stay in the black, see how much better things look when you're in the red.

ISA THE SIGN OF THE TIMES.

To find out more about how the ISA Network can build your sales, call us at (212) 593-9800. Fax (212) 593-9198.

Newspapers see circulation 'win'

By Ira Teinowitz

The Persian Gulf War combined with perhaps a recession-borne interest in job opportunities helped make the past six months productive for newspaper circulation.

The Audit Bureau of Circulations FAS-FAX report for the six months ending March 31 showed few large newspapers reporting declining circulation and many reporting growth.

The report compares circulation with the same period last year.

The biggest growth came in New York, where newspapers obviously benefited from labor troubles at the Daily News under former owner Tribune Co.

The Daily News itself didn't report circulation and decided to skip the period because of its travails and subsequent ownership changes.

All other New York papers, including The New York Times, reported major increases. The Times reported circulation rose 5.2% to 1,209,225 daily and 3.3% to 1,762,015 on Sunday; the New York Post reported daily circulation jumped 27.7% to 644,738; and Newsday (which combines its Long Island and New York circulation in reporting) said it rose 16.1% to 825,512 daily and 34.5% to 960,308 on Sunday.

The biggest growth came in New York, where newspapers obviously benefited from labor troubles at the Daily News under former owner Tribune Co. The Daily News itself didn't report circulation and decided to skip the period because of its travails and subsequent ownership changes.

The Post continues to enjoy sales well above prestrike levels, though less than during the strike, officials said last week. The paper estimates daily sales are in the 550,000 to 600,000 range, compared to 504,720 reported last year.

The Times suggested its circulation increase wasn't due to the Daily News strike, noting more than 40% of its daily circulation gain came from the national edition. Despite price hikes in some areas, the national edition's circulation rose 11.2% to 248,660 daily and 6.5% to 304,570 on Sunday.

"Our readership and ad base are different from the New York Daily News'," said William Adler, corporate communications manager. "The war certainly gave us some small incremental circulation, but we have invested in the product."

The national edition now has three sections, up from two, and the paper has pushed suburban marketing, Mr. Adler said.

Several newspapers including the nation's largest, The Wall Street Journal, reported circulation decreases. But most—including the Journal—pointed to price increases.

The Journal, which boosted its single-copy price 50% to 75¢ on Dec. 3 and increased subscription prices 7.8% to $139 annually effective this year, said it was down 0.9% in circulation to 1,919,355.

The Houston Post also blamed price increases for circulation losses.

"Any time you raise your prices, you are going to take a hit," said Rikie Daniels, marketing director for the Post.

The paper raised its single-copy price 40% to 35¢ on Jan. 1 and saw circulation drop 5.5% to 310,758. It has since matched the Houston Chronicle's move to a 50¢ price.

The Boston Herald raised its price 40% to 35¢ on April 30, 1990, and saw circulation fall 5.1% to 351,947. But the Boston economy may also have been a factor.

"Certainly, the economic climate in the region had an impact," said John Hoarty, VP-circulation. "Unemployment in Massachusetts is in double-digit levels."

The Milwaukee Journal, which didn't raise its price, reported circulation dropped 7.5% to 255,497.

Outside New York, the biggest gain in the top 50 newspapers was reported by The Orange County Register, which saw circulation rise 6.8% to 372,750 daily and 6.7% to 429,146 on Sunday. □

Ratings based on Audit Bureau of Circulations information. Figures are for six months ending March 31, 1991, compared with the same six-month period last year, except where noted. Where papers reported Monday through Thursday circulation and separate figures for higher-selling Friday papers, the figures are weighted averages of the two.

K-III mulling list?

NEW YORK—American Express Publishing Corp. President Thomas O. Ryder, The New Yorker President Steven T. Florio and former Diamandis Communications Inc. President Peter Diamandis are said to be among a short list of candidates to head the nine consumer publications K-III Holdings agreed to buy from News Corp. last month. Murdoch Magazines President Leslie Hinton will remain with News Corp. after the pending $650 million sale (AA, April 29). Messrs. Ryder and Florio declined comment, as did K-III officials; Mr. Diamandis couldn't be reached.

FDA readies second strike

Cholesterol-related and 'light' claims next on list of targets

By Steven W. Colford and Judann Dagnoli

WASHINGTON—Food marketers using cholesterol-related or "light" claims will likely be next on the Food & Drug Administration's hit list, agency officials say.

Even as the FDA was completing its enforcement actions against food and beverage marketers for use of the term "fresh," the resurgent agency under new Commissioner David Kessler was looking for new targets.

"We are going to go into other areas," said Jeff Nesbit, FDA associate commissioner for public affairs. "I'm not yet in a position to say which. . . . There will be a definitive next step in an area like 'fresh,' where claims for marketing purposes are misleading to consumers."

"There will be a definitive next step . . . where claims for marketing purposes are misleading to consumers."

An FDA official said the agency felt that "if a food company wants to make an impact on consumers, a term they'll use is 'fresh' and another is 'cholesterol-free' or 'low-cholesterol.' "

The official mentioned "margarine or corn oil" as products that potentially will be scrutinized for cholesterol-related claims.

"Those are products that might tend to mislead customers into thinking that the product is good for their heart even though its fat content might not be," the agency official said. "But nothing has begun yet; we're still wrapping up 'fresh.' "

The 1938 Food, Drug & Cosmetics Act is the basis for the FDA's new enthusiasm for enforcement, said one official, who reiterated the agency's intention to look into possible misuses of "light" and cholesterol-related statements. The act, among other things, prohibits false and misleading claims.

In its pursuit of "fresh" offend-

ANPA taps Black, plans big changes

By Rance Crain

VANCOUVER—The American Newspaper Publishers Association is spearheading a sweeping reorganization of the industry's selling and marketing arms. And it's banking on the surprise appointment last week of Cathie Black to president-ceo to get newspapers moving again.

The industry, brought together at the ANPA's 105th convention, seems determined to tap more national advertising and for the first time has launched an advertising program of its own.

The need for radical change dominated last week's meeting.

"We are currently a mass vehicle in a demassified market," Lloyd G. Schermer, chairman-ceo of Lee Enterprises and outgoing ANPA chairman, said in his keynote address. "We are attempting to sell product, not tailored solutions to marketing problems."

■ One on One interview with Cathie Black—Page 48.
■ Tina Brown tells ANPA how it misread the market—Page 48.

James Barry Agnew, VP-sales promotion of Canada's largest retailer, Hudson's Bay Co., added: "If you make the assumption we [newspapers and retailers] are both dinosaurs, who will adapt to change faster?"

Ms. Black, in brief remarks at lunch May 7, said she's eager to work with advertisers to change their perceptions of newspapers and to bring more women and minorities into the business.

"I hope to create a sense of urgency about diversity—from the board room to the news room," she said. "It's good business, and it's long overdue. The face we put forward must reflect the future, not the past" (see interview with Ms. Black on Page 48).

Eveready lashes Coors in court

By Julie Liesse and Ira Teinowitz

CHICAGO—Eveready Battery Co. executives lashed into Coors Brewing Co. last week in U.S. District Court for ripping off Eveready's award-winning Energizer bunny campaign.

"Coors is making a blatant attempt to take a free ride on our success," Michael Rivard, category manager for Eveready batteries, said in testimony before Judge Charles Norgle.

"It steals [our idea]—it's stolen it from Energizer batteries," he said. "It's a campaign we've spent a lot of money to develop. This would minimize our efforts and give a false association with Coors Light beer."

The Triple Crown

Last month, U.S.News won three of the most prestigious awards in journalism.

1. Overseas Press Club Award

The Overseas Press Club Award for the Best General Magazine Article on Foreign Affairs for "The Most Dangerous Man in the World," a grave warning about the menace of Saddam Hussein – published ten weeks before Saddam invaded Kuwait. It meticulously outlined the size and scope of the arsenal being accumulated in Iraq.

Commenting on this cover story, the Washington Post said, "U.S.News can lay claim to some remarkable prescience.... Such editorial decisions are not flukes, but evidence of thinking ahead of the curve."

2. National Magazine Award

The National Magazine Award for Feature Writing for "Vietnam Story," a powerful reconstruction of the first major battle of that war and a tough analysis of its lessons and consequences -- written by Joseph Galloway, the only journalist present at that engagement 25 years ago.

Galloway also covered the war in the Persian Gulf for U.S.News, where his reporting was part of the extensive war coverage that Forbes magazine called "a journalistic coup.... Just as CNN left the networks running to catch up in TV coverage, U.S.News pulled off a similar feat over its newsweekly rivals."

3. Sigma Delta Chi Award

The Sigma Delta Chi Award for Magazine Reporting for "Death at Sea," an expose by Peter Cary of the Navy's investigation into the explosion aboard the U.S.S. Iowa. Within two months, the Navy reopened the case.

It's one example why government and business leaders in Washington, in a recent survey by Washingtonian magazine, rated U.S. News more accurate than any other newsmagazine. And why Forbes calls U.S.News "the most useful, readable newsweekly."

These three awards, plus the White House Correspondents' Association's Award for Presidential Coverage and sixteen other major awards received for 1990, confirm our commitment to deliver the best newsmagazine journalism in America.

Eurocom's on top

Network is first in AA's European ranking

By Nancy Giges

GLOBAL NEWS

Eurocom is Europe's No. 1 agency network in Advertising Age's 1990 ranking of networks by geographical region.

In the Asia/Pacific, Dentsu remained the No. 1 network as did McCann-Erickson Worldwide in Latin America.

By purchasing the European agencies of the former HDM network and merging them with the former Eurocom WCRS Della Femina Ball network, Eurocom dominated Europe. The resulting network had $590.6 million in gross income on billings of $4 billion. In 1989, HDM ranked No. 8 and EWDB No. 11 in Europe.

Publicis FCB, the alliance between Publicis Communications, Paris, and Foote, Cone & Belding Communications, Chicago, dropped to the No. 2 slot with $422.5 million in gross income on billings of $2.9 billion.

In other jumps, RSCG Group moved to No. 8 from No. 16 and BDDP Group moved to No. 15 from No. 19. Lintas:Worldwide fell to No. 9 from No. 7, J. Walter Thompson Co. dropped to No. 11 from No. 9 and Lowe International fell to No. 17 from No. 15. N W Ayer and Armando Testa Group joined the top 20 last year.

The numbers submitted by RSCG for its French business have been challenged by Publicis FCB since they differ from those submitted to the French agency association, Association des Agences Conseils en Communication. That group didn't include "media representation" in RSCG's totals, and Ad Age did, but this publication is re-evaluating its position for next year.

Ad Age ranked RSCG France No. 1 in France and Publicis Conseil No. 2 (AA, March 25). The agency association ranked Publicis Conseil first and RSCG second.

If the agency association numbers were used to calculate this listing, RSCG would be ninth rather than eighth in Europe.

Rankings are based on gross income in dollar amounts that an agency organization derives from the region. The figures reflect the percentage of equity the network owns. Several large Japanese and Brazilian agencies were omitted because they lack offices outside their home countries.

As the world's largest agency and with most of its income derived from its home market, Dentsu dominated the Asia/Pacific region with 1990 gross income of nearly $1.2 billion on billings of nearly $9.1 billion. Other Japanese agencies stayed high on the 12-country region's list because of their size in their homeland and the yen's strength against the dollar.

Among agencies showing momentum was Ogilvy & Mather, moving up two places to No. 10, with gross income of $74.4 million on billings of $512.8 million.

In Latin America, McCann, with $70.6 million in gross income, maintained a strong lead over JWT, which had $46 million in gross income.

Young & Rubicam moved up to No. 4 from No. 6, bypassing Lintas and Duailibi, Petit, Zaragoza.

Because of the volatility of Latin American currencies, percentages of change to 1990 from 1989 weren't calculated.

Five agencies—McCann, O&M, JWT, Leo Burnett Co. and Saatchi & Saatchi Co.—are listed in all three regions. Only one, McCann, captured a No. 1 slot. JWT held a No. 2 position, and O&M held a No. 3.

As a group, the top 20 agency organizations in Europe accounted for gross income of $5.2 billion on billings of $35.5 billion. Gross income for the top 15 in Asia totaled $2.8 billion on billings of $21.3 billion, and the top 10 in Latin America had gross income of $306 million on billings of $2 billion □

AT&T campaign touts translation service

By Kate Fitzgerald

AT&T Co. wants to be the first long-distance telephone marketer to speak every language.

The telecommunications giant has started running its first TV spot for Language Line, its foreign-language interpreting service, and last week began a print campaign in national newspapers.

The year-old program offers 24-hour, live translation of more than 140 languages on three-way calls with interpreters.

Requests for Language Line have boomed in the past 12 months among telemarketing companies, insurance marketers, the hospitality industry, and law enforcement and emergency services agencies, said Karen Arnett, Language Line general manager.

"The program is growing due to huge numbers of foreign people moving to the U.S., plus the continued globalization of the world economy," she said. "Major opportunities are also opening up in Eastern Europe and Asia."

With the $5 million campaign, AT&T is now wooing the general public to the service. Language Line costs $3.50 per minute for consumers; the fee can be charged to any major credit card or AT&T's Calling Card. Fees for businesses are $2.75 per minute after a one-time, $1,500 sign-up fee.

The line can be accessed via a toll-free number.

The 30-second network TV spot features a conversation, via a translator, between a U.S. executive on a fishing vacation and a business associate who speaks Korean. The commercial is themed "It's in the cards," promoting services available through AT&T's Calling Card.

Wunderman Worldwide, New York, handles.

AT&T expects competitors including MCI Communications Corp. and US Sprint to start copying the service soon, Ms. Arnett said.

MCI has no similar service available yet, said Roy Gamse, senior VP-customer service, but the No. 2 long-distance marketer is rapidly adding new foreign language translation services to its operator and customer assistance departments.

No. 3 US Sprint also offers operator assistance "in a variety of languages," but the company has no plans at this point to market a translation service, said Steve Dykes, public relations manager. □

Mixed bag in E. Europe

Agency execs are optimistic despite problems

By Milan Ruzicka

PRAGUE—Western ad agencies are finding more problems than they bargained for in Eastern Europe but remain upbeat about long-term business prospects.

Local companies generally don't understand advertising, and international clients grossly overestimate the level of marketing sophistication in Eastern Europe, said Yves Englebert, office manager of McCann-Erickson Prague.

Clients tend to hire agencies to produce a single ad, not understanding the concept of an account or that ad strategy is an ongoing process, agency sources say.

"Sometimes I feel like a missionary, going from client to client trying to explain what advertising is all about," Mr. Englebert said.

With offices in Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Hungary, Poland and the Soviet Union, McCann is among the most broadly represented Western ad agencies. The agency's major clients in Eastern Europe include General Motors Corp.'s Opel, Gillette Co. and Nestle.

Jiri Kratena, managing director of Young & Rubicam Czechoslovakia, said that availability of qualified people will determine the pace of Y&R's growth for some time to come. Y&R, with offices in Hungary and the Soviet Union as well as here, handles many local clients plus Minolta copiers.

Qualified people are hard to find, the executives say, and quality of work is so low that even simple jobs such as printing posters or developing film must be sent abroad.

Agencies must train art directors, media planners, account execs, designers and copywriters from scratch. There are no specialists in related fields from which to draw.

"Fortunately, the labor here is so cheap that you can hire two people for one job," Mr. Englebert he said.

In addition, Eastern European languages don't lend themselves to commercial slogans, the ad executives say. For example, it can take five words to express the meaning of a single English word. Grammar is more inflexible, so it's difficult to play with language as Western ads often do.

McCann is struggling with translating Gillette's slogan, "The best a man can get," Mr. Englebert said.

"The verbatim translation into Czech is correct but has lost all its punch," he said. "All the words seem too long, so we need to invent some new ones."

Most of these problems are found throughout Eastern Europe. Hungary, however, "has more experience with a market economy than Czechoslovakia and is ahead" of all the region's emerging democracies, he said.

But the agency executives insist this is the right time to be here.

"In five years, the agencies will be fighting for clients. . . . we have a head start," Mr. Englebert said. □

TELEVISION BUYING & PLANNING

A JOINT REPORT BY ADVERTISING AGE AND ELECTRONIC MEDIA

TO OUR READERS

Tracking television can be a terrific mess.
Network and spot, cable and syndication.
Upfront and scatter.
Program and daypart.
Audience size, composition and guarantees.
Underdelivery and make-goods.
CPMs and unit costs.
Multi-media and value-added packages.
It all can make an advertiser's head spin.

Recognizing that the components of the TV marketplace have become much more complex, Crain Communications Inc. sister publications Advertising Age and Electronic Media joined forces to bring some order to the chaos. This 36-page report tracking the trends and the issues in the TV ad marketplace is the fruit of those labors.

The timing of this project is far from coincidental.

As buyers head into the upfront TV ad buying season, lingering in their minds will be thoughts of the decline of network viewership; the lack of a network hit in the 1990-91 TV season—not to mention the inability of one network to emerge from the pack; economic downturns and budget tightening; and recent bargain-basement scatter market deals.

To more accurately gauge advertisers' attitudes and plans for TV spending, Ad Age and EM commissioned Bruskin Associates, New Brunswick, N.J., to conduct a survey of advertising agency and client-company media executives.

The sample size of 151 interviews, conducted via telephone, reflects a statistically reliable representation of both target respondent groups. It is important to note the interviews were conducted between Jan. 22 and Feb. 1, during the Persian Gulf War.

In stories appearing on the following pages, surveyed TV buyers discuss in hard numbers and percentages how they expect the next upfront and scatter markets to develop.

And if you're a TV seller, the picture doesn't look favorable.

Although buyers show TV still commanding the majority of ad expenditures, TV media are receiving a smaller percentage of total ad dollars.

They also reveal which of the various TV media are receiving the biggest chunk of TV dollars. Although network remains the venerable big-bucks player, cable is shown to have solidified its place as the up-and-coming TV medium.

Buyers also claim, for the first time in years, that they will set the tenor of upfront discussions. On the following pages they even tell TV media sellers—whom they expect to be in the mood to cut some choice deals—what they expect to see in terms of cost-per-thousand and unit-cost adjustments for the upfront season.

Multi-media, multi-year buys also are gaining in importance, according to surveyed buyers, although an exploration of the automakers' TV buying strategies shows current market conditions may make it smarter for many advertisers to sit on the sidelines and watch how the market proceeds.

Throughout this section, we have interspersed some faces with the names, introducing you to the men and women who buy TV and asking them a series of questions, from how they've gotten into the business to where it's heading.

As one of the buyers, Douglas Seay of Hal Riney & Partners, puts it, the upfront season will be "volatile and unpredictable. There's no secret formula to tell."

Hopefully, this section will help put it in focus.

Major findings show TV's picture no brighter

One result emerges from the many findings of the Bruskin Associates survey of agency and client company media executives commissioned by Advertising Age and Electronic Media: The TV business is stuck in neutral–and that's an optimistic assessment.

Only 34% of survey respondents, whose opinions on issues facing TV media appear in stories throughout this report, increased their 1991 TV budgets.

Even those who are doing so aren't breaking the bank: 56% of those putting more money in TV buys are increasing budgets 10% or less.

TV enters Dark Age if forecasts are right

Lousy economy, lower ad budgets, inventory surfeit could add up to a lot of fence-sitting

By Wayne Walley

The outlook for the 1991-92 television season looks grim.

Early projections from TV buying veterans indicate the industry's ad revenues, at best, will slow this year. At worst, they'll come to a grinding halt.

Most advertisers and agency executives say TV spending for the 1991-92 TV season will be flat or down from the just-finished season, citing the economic recession for lowering the boom on ad budgets.

According to a Bruskin Associates survey commissioned by Advertising Age and Electronic Media, 32% of survey respondents say they will have a smaller TV budget this year, while another 28% report their budgets will be static.

In other words, three of every five survey respondents claim their final 1991 TV ad budgets will be no bigger than last year's.

Their TV spending plans reflect a tougher stance: Only 45% of respondents report 1990 budgets were flat or down from 1989 vs. 60% saying 1991 spending will not increase.

However, TV budgets are not necessarily being directed to other media. TV still receives the bulk of ad budgets: Survey respondents say they will allocate an average of 67% of their ad budgets to TV media including network, cable, syndication and spot.

TV simply appears to be suffering along with other media as total media advertising budgets tighten in the recession.

Richard A. Goldberg

"Budgets are down across the board," says Richard Kostyra, exec VP-U.S. director of media services for J. Walter Thompson USA, New York. "The odd person is up and a few are level."

The survey's respondents cite overall budget reductions most often as their reason for slashing TV spending. For example, of respondents who say they cut network TV spending last year, 55% attribute it to an overall ad budget reduction.

But not all the news from buyers is gloomy.

Sellers are heartened by the fact 34% of survey respondents say their 1991 TV ad budget will be bigger than in 1990.

"If more than 30% are saying their budgets will be bigger, I'll take that," says Jon Nesvig, senior VP-sales for Fox Broadcasting Co.

"Right now, frankly, the tension is over the uncertainty. People say budgets will be down or the same assuming the economic conditions remain the same. I don't know if that's an assumption that can be made," Mr. Nesvig says. "What we're seeing is maybe a bottoming out in the recession and a slow recovery with planned network TV expenditures a lagging indicator."

Mr. Nesvig theorizes some survey responses could have been restrained so buyers would retain a better bargaining position during upfront sales.

Some also might have been affected by the Persian Gulf War, which was in its second week when survey interviews were conducted.

But the attitude of the buying community has not changed in the months after the war's end.

"We're still in a recession," says Louis Schultz, exec VP-director of media services for Lintas:USA, New York. "With all the economic factors, clients have decided to hold back."

He says several clients are retaining the option to direct money that may be earmarked for media advertising toward the bottom line if the economy continues to sour into the fourth quarter.

Charles Bachrach, senior VP-director of network and programming for Rubin Postaer & Associates, Los Angeles, says people are being "understandably cautious" because of a bad economy and what has been a soft network scatter market in the first and second quarters of 1991.

"People are re-evaluating their strategies," Mr. Bachrach says.

What this means, he says, is the potential for more competition among TV media segments for a larger share of ad budgets.

For example, the cable industry and barter syndicators were once again trying to get the jump on the broadcast networks by making upfront presentations in April and early May.

Most cable networks are stressing their ability to deliver targeted audiences at a lower price than broadcast networks. This positioning allows them to take advantage of an attitude shift by some advertisers toward micromarketing and niche marketing, and may play well among advertisers looking for lower out-of-pocket costs.

Syndicators also are expounding on their lower costs. They also highlight the audience delivery of their products in various dayparts including weekday afternoons, prime-time access, prime time and late night.

In response, many believe the broadcast networks, sensing the trepidation of advertisers, might hold the line on price increases to reduce the cost differential between themselves and the other alternatives and spur more spending.

Some believe economic hard times mean a return to "tried and true" TV media, particularly network TV.

Burger King Corp., for example, plans to combat the recession by increasing its network TV spending with its "Your way. Right away" campaign via D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New

Call it a quadrennial or, in '92, call it a quandary

By Wayne Walley

One would expect TV salespeople to be eyeing the calendar, waiting for 1992 to roll around. Both a presidential election and Olympic Games are scheduled then, usually causing sales and spending booms.

But 1992 could be different.

"Anyone counting on the quadrennial [the four-year Olympics/election cycle] is putting faith in an unknown," says Richard Kostyra, exec VP-U.S. director of media services, J. Walter Thompson USA, New York.

"I don't think you can count on historic patterns next year," he says.

Normally, the Olympics tighten the marketplace by removing inventory from sale.

But the 1992 Games could help create a soft upfront selling season and soft scatter markets in the next TV season.

Marketers previously funded Olympics buys from budgets not related to media spending. But the increased cost of doing so now has made more companies plan to take money for the Olympics directly from TV ad budgets, media buyers say.

As buyers cut other TV budgets to pay for the Olympics, they'll have less to spend on the normal TV season.

"Clients will take [funds] out of existing budgets to pay for the Olympics. Then the networks can say how much they've brought in for the Olympics, but they will have to ask why prime-time spending is down, too," says Charles Bachrach, senior VP-director of network and programming, Rubin Postaer & Associates, Los Angeles.

CBS and NBC, which are carrying the 1992 Winter and Summer Games, respectively, report about half of their Olympic inventory has been sold so far.

Media buyers say, however, the Olympic marketplace ground to a standstill during the Persian Gulf War and is just now slowly getting back in gear.

Buyers also question how strong an effect the 1992 presidential election will have on the TV marketplace.

Media planners now are wrestling with the various scenarios trying to determine how much money to commit upfront and how much to hold back in hopes of bargain prices.

"If the market is flat in terms of demand, the networks will wind up with excess supply, which means depressed prices [in scatter]," Mr. Bachrach says.

In that case, using history as a guide, the presidential election theoretically could fill the void in 1992. In 1988, the Bush for President Committee and the Dukakis for President Committee spent a combined $30.6 million on network TV, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service.

But media buyers aren't so sure the networks can count on national spending by presidential candidates to rise in 1992.

"Money is tight and the Republican position is strong," says Mr. Kostyra.

However, Betsy Frank, senior VP-director of TV information and new media for Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York, says local cable could benefit from its ability to allow local candidates to better target constituencies.

"Cable could be a formidable beneficiary on the local level," Ms. Frank says.

Cable reps, however, see themselves far behind spot TV as a medium for political ads.

Political spending on cable in 1992 will be significantly greater than in 1990 or 1988, says Robert Alter, president, Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau.

But, he adds, this amount won't begin to rival spot and local broadcast spending.

Total spending for spot and local political ads was $189.4 million in 1988 and $203.3 million in 1990, according to the Television Bureau of Advertising. Political ad spending on cable that year totaled about $12 million, according to the National Cable Television Association.

"My feeling is that in 1992 we will double what cable did the last time, in 1988," CAB's Mr. Alter says. "But I don't think cable will overtake [spot and local] next year." □

The cry grows louder: Why buy upfront?

Multitude of factors in 1991-92 season likely to upset the applecart on how time is bought

By Joe Mandese

It's late March.

A $100 million broadcast TV advertiser is on the phone discussing his 1991-92 buying strategy with his network buyer.

"I can buy cable, syndication, unwired networks and spot TV all cheaper than network. I'm buying network scatter for 50% of what I was paying in the upfront and it's guaranteed," says the client.

"So why in the world would I want to buy upfront?"

Such conversations have not been uncommon in recent months as major network advertisers began planning their buying strategies for the 1991-92 TV season.

With the softest scatter market in recent memory still fresh in their minds, many buyers are questioning the viability, let alone the vitality, of the upfront market.

The weak scatter market and the soft economy's effect on ad budgets threaten the networks' attempt to turn in another consecutive record-setting sales total in the upfront season.

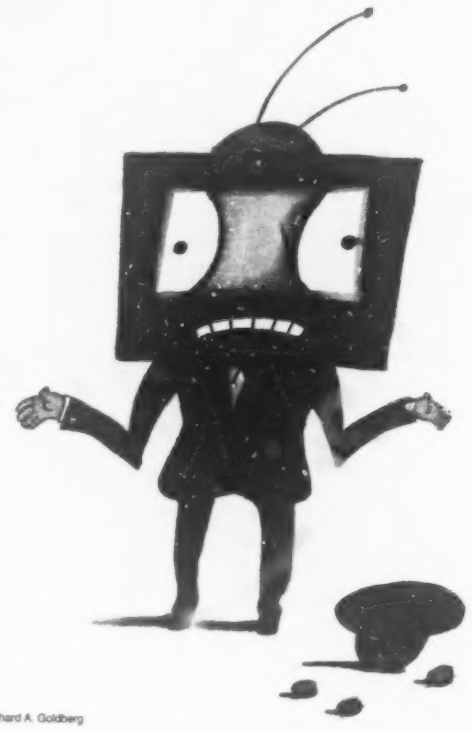
Advertisers traditionally buy upfront for price benefits, flexibility—advertisers generally can cancel up to 50% of upfront commitments, unlike typical scatter where all deals are firm—and ratings guarantees. But because the networks provided these options during the current season's scatter market, advertisers wonder whether they need to buy upfront this year.

"I don't think there has been an upfront market that has been more questionable," says Gene DeWitt, president of DeWitt Media, a New York-based media planning and buying company.

A Bruskin Associates survey of advertiser and agency media executives commissioned by Advertising Age and Electronic Media confirms this opinion. More than half the respondents—58%—expect the 1991 upfront buying season to be less active than last year. Only 11% predicted it would be more active and 28% said it would be the same.

"My gut feel is that this year's upfront will be down," predicts Bill Croasdale, exec VP-director of network and programming, Western International Media, Los Angeles.

The total upfront sales figure "could be down $500 million," Mr. Croasdale says. If this should happen, the upfront sales total would drop almost 12% to $3.8 billion from last year's $4.3 billion.



Richard A. Goldberg

Network sales executives are not as bearish, saying the market will be flat or just slightly down from last year's upfront.

It's not unusual for a soft scatter market to presage a soft upfront market, but the level and duration of 1990-91 scatter market softness has amplified the suggestions of how soft this year's upfront season could be.

Scatter market prices, which have been soft since the start of the current network season, bottomed out during the first quarter of 1991 because of concerns about the economy and displaced inventory from the networks' war coverage.

"You could get terrific bargains during the first quarter," says Doug Seay, VP-director of broadcast programming, Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco. "We saw prime-time stuff available for 65% below what it was the year before in January, but that was the bottom of the barrel, just prior to the war."

First-quarter scatter unit prices averaged 35% to 40% below upfront rates, with some buyers reporting deals at 60% below upfront.

Although scatter prices have increased appreciably during the second quarter, they still remain significantly below upfront rates, with buyers reporting discounts of up to 15%.

Not only have these buys featured cut-rate prices, but some of the larger purchases came with audience

York, that broke last month.

But the fast-food marketer has not increased its annual $200 million ad budget to include the network TV bump. Instead, it plans to cut non-network TV spending and secondary programs.

Most media buyers say they will recommend a similar strategy to their clients if cuts have to be made in spending.

"In tight times, you work your way from the bottom to the most impactful media [when making cuts]," Mr. Schultz says.

According to the Advertising Age/Electronic Media survey, the bulk of TV budgets will go toward high-exposure network TV. Respondents name network TV most often as the TV business that offers the best return on advertising dollars. Network TV draws a 40% response, compared with 28% for cable, 17% for spot and 2% for syndication.

Accordingly, respondents say they'll spend an average of 39% on network TV in 1991, while spot TV will get an average of 26%, cable 11% and syndication 10%.

Both network TV and spot TV are mentioned most often as the types of TV receiving the greatest dollar increase in 1991 budgets. Cable TV is mentioned by 10% and syndication 6%, while network and spot were mentioned by 26% of respondents.

Others say the tough economy will force people to look for more value in media buys and become more discriminating.

"I hope buyers won't go the easy route to just tried and true media," says Mr. Bachrach. "You have to look for deals and opportunities."

Survey respondents most often name cable TV as receiving the greatest percentage increase in budgets this year among the various TV media. Some 34% of respondents say cable is receiving the largest budgetary bump, while spot TV is cited by 19%, network TV by 16% and syndication by 3%.

Some 70% of respondents increased their cable TV spending in 1990, while 50% boosted spot TV spending and 35% upped syndication spending.

Cable also is cited by 84% of survey respondents as the TV medium with the greatest growth potential. "Certain cable networks will do very well this year," Mr. Bachrach says.

Although he admits network TV generally offers the best costs per thousand viewers, "Often smaller clients are driven to cable by the smaller out-of-pocket costs."

If the economy picks up later this year, Mr. Schultz says TV ad budgets could increase, even though marketers may have started 1991 with the intent of reining in TV spending.

Most buyers believe network TV would be the first beneficiary as advertisers flock to take advantage of perceived bargains. Then, once the network economy tightens, other TV media may benefit even more as buyers again would seek alternatives to higher network prices.

Such a change in the economy would return the TV business to previous spending patterns that seemed to favor growth for alternative TV media.

If there's a silver lining among the predictions of reduced spending, it's that TV media are suffering no more than other outlets.

"This isn't an issue of TV doesn't work," says Mr. Schultz. "TV as a whole is not down. There are new ways to use it with cable, syndication and other things like switching network dayparts around. TV is still a priority for most advertisers." □

LET'S BE UPFRONT

The critical moment of the TV buying season is at hand.

Last year, advertisers poured $4.3 billion into upfront deals, but this year a weak scatter market, smaller ad budgets and higher costs could markedly reduce advertisers' interest.

To gauge what major buyers in each of the various upfront markets are thinking heading into the wheeling and dealing, Advertising Age and Electronic Media conducted short interviews with top buyers in each. Their opinions appear throughout this section under the banner, "Let's be upfront."

Appropriately, we start below with the children's upfront market, which breaks first.

Laurie Freeman, an Ann Arbor, Mich.-based free-lance writer, conducted the interviews.

Alan Bohbot, chairman, Bohbot Communications, New York

Syndication heads upfront: "This is the first time in modern times the syndicators broke before the networks; usually they go side-by-side or after the networks.

Alan Bohbot

'If we assume the total kids' advertising budget is frozen at about $550 million and syndication has now done well, about $160 million, something has to give. Either the Saturday morning network will give, although we expect that to be strong, or more likely cable or spot TV will be hurt."

The hot buys: "The hot stuff is pretty much the same stuff that was popular last year.

"The show we forecast [as] No. 1 will be 'Beetlejuice' on Fox [Broadcasting Co.]."

"Beetlejuice" also appears on ABC on Saturday mornings, and "the logic would be that if you had a show airing on Saturday and you add Monday through Friday, you'd be diluting the audience. But in the kids' market it works just the opposite.

"There appear to be two sets of kids: those who watch Saturday morning and those who watch Monday through Friday. The two groups don't overlap [in age], but there seems to be some synergistic effect. The additional exposure will help the audience."

The same effect should result from network moves to introduce animated shows into prime-time slots, he says.

"It raises the awareness of the show. Prime-time exposure would help, not hurt."

Scatter shot: There used to be "very little scatter. [But] I think what every syndicator did this year was say he's not going to stick around and wait to see whether there's scatter; they're going to go upfront. And they went upfront, aggressively priced and they sold out [their inventory].

"What it seems to be telling us is that the kids' business is really an upfront business and there's very little scatter to come."

guarantees—a device usually reserved for upfront buyers.

"I would doubt that you are going to see anyone getting individually guaranteed deals for the third quarter [of 1991]," says Aaron Cohen, senior VP-director of national broadcast programming, N W Ayer, New York.

Moreover, advertisers have exercised higher than normal levels of their third-quarter cancellation options, which returned an estimated $200 million to the third-quarter scatter market. The inclusion of guarantees in scatter buys seems to undermine a primary reason for buying upfront, buyers say.

Other buyers say pricing will be the key ingredient in generating upfront sales.

"The question isn't whether the networks will discount this upfront. It's how much they will discount," says Louis Schultz, exec VP-director of media services, Lintas:USA, New York.

Early in this season, some buyers were talking about receiving discounts of as much as 50% below last year's upfront prices, but going into this year's negotiations, he says they will more likely be "down 15% to flat."

If prices increase, he says many buyers will sit out the upfront market and gamble on scatter prices and availability.

"Scatter won't stay soft forever, so you can't assume that this will happen again next year," says Mr. Seay. "It's soft now, but I'm not convinced that it is going to stay soft. And all you've got to do is get burned once."

But others say the current mood of the marketplace presages a soft future for the networks.

"The market is still soft, so there is more leverage," says Linda Urben, corporate manager-broadcast media, AT&T Co. "I think folks will be a little more conservative. Who would have known about the war and the recession this time around? So, I think budgets will be down."

Despite such warnings, some buyers say the networks can conduct a successful upfront season.

"Buying upfront will make sense, but only if the networks make it sensible," says Mr. DeWitt.

> "Scatter won't stay soft forever, so you can't assume this will happen again next year. It's soft now, but I'm not convinced that it is going to stay soft. All you've got to do is get burned once."

He says pricing and firm guarantees will be the primary motivating factors, but that other incentives may play a role, including value-added marketing, increased cancellation options and even options to expand network inventory during the year at previously negotiated rates.

"It's not so much that the money disappeared, as much as it has been diverted to other places," says Irwin Gotlieb, senior VP-director of national broadcasting and programming, D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York.

But others warn this season could be the first step in the demise of the upfront buying season, or at least some serious changes in the way it is conducted.

"It's pure insanity," says Ms. Urben. "It would be nice to think that someday this industry would figure it out so that it's not a night-and-day, kill-everybody scene." □

BY THE BUY

Word has it that buyers will have the upper hand in the upcoming 1991-92 TV buying season.

So who are these buyers?

To put some perspective behind the mass of men and women taking their clients' dollars into the upfront selling season, Advertising Age and Electronic Media profiled 12 buyers who purchase TV ad time—lots of it.

We selected these media buyers from agencies that ranked among the top 10 in billings placed in each specific TV medium to guarantee a view of the business from the top.

Buyers were asked identical questions on the upcoming buying season and other TV-related issues, plus a little biographical information.

These 12 profiles—starting with the one below of Bill Croasdale, who just moved from Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York, to Western International Media, Los Angeles—appear throughout this section under the banner, "By the buy."

Alicia Lasek, a free-lance writer in Chicago, conducted the series of interviews.

Name: Bill Croasdale
Title, agency: exec VP-director of network and programming, Western International Media, Los Angeles
Years in current position: Just started
Years in media department: 31
How did you wind up buying TV? "I entertained these big hopes of being a copywriter but discovered that I could n't spell, so I moved into buying."

Bill Croasdale

What do you like most about buying TV? "The constant change. Nothing's static."
What do you like least about buying TV? "All of the changes."
If you weren't buying media, what would you rather be doing? "There is nothing else as exciting and challenging as this business. It keeps you young. You must be in constant touch with everything that's going on."
What do you expect for unit costs and CPMs in network TV? A possible decrease but no increase. "This is the year when the marketplace rights or adjusts itself. A lot is predicated on the fact that cable has arri as well as syndicated and unwired networks."
What do you expect for the upfront season? "Long hours and a lot of hot tempers. The networks are going to be looking for increases, and the advertising community will be looking for decreases."
Who's holding the cards? Buyers—"at this point."
Did you feel the same way about last year's upfront? No. "Last year, the networks ramrodded us into that [households using television and persons using television] factor. This year, we're going to turn it around."
Is the TV audience measurement issue going to be hot or cold? Cold
Is the audience guarantee issue going to be hot or cold? "There will be hard guarantees, similar to what Fox [Broadcasting Co.] did last year."
What's the most important issue for network TV? A need for creative shows, "whether it's 'Cop Rock' or 'Twin Peaks.' We keep reverting to the tried and true."
Which network is the one to watch this year? "All four of them are going to have to work hard. No one has an edge on anyone else."
What type of program is your personal favorite? The Playboy Channel
What shows do you try to stay home and watch? "I make it a point to catch every show on the networks several times in a season. It's one way to ensure that the writing and production quality is consistent. If [those things] slip, it sends the signal [the show may be in trouble]."
What shows do you regularly videotape? None. "I don't have an M.S. in electrical engineering."
What show do you wish hadn't been canceled? " 'Laugh In,' and 'All in the Family' in its heyday. But genres and programs pass."
What is your current favorite broadcast show? "Cheers": "It has outstanding writing and production."
Characterize the quality of the average network show: "Quality means different things to different people. It could mean high ratings, favorable reviews, shows that cover sensitive subjects."

"We anticipate that the general softness will continue.

"Budgets for many advertisers will not be as large as they were last year.

"Therefore," he continues, "the total amount of money that will be spent initially will be less, which we are expecting will lead to no increase in prices or diminution of prices.

"I think every advertiser is going to try to hold until the last available moment to see whether there is an uptick in any indicator or their own sales.

"And in all probability, a number of advertisers are not going to be able to make very aggressive moves unless the full world economy begins to move.

"If you're on the network side, it's a grim market.

"If you're on the advertiser side, there's a chance to buy advertising values at more reasonable rates."

Playing the waiting game: "Advertisers will hold their cards.

"That's why there will be a pressure on the networks downward with initial monies because of people doing different things with the money they have available."

'More important than price'

While the novelty has clearly worn off, and scatter prices are devilishly attractive, multi-media deals inflame marketer interest

By Christine Bunish

The current softness in the scatter market is failing to stifle surprisingly attentive interest in multi-media deals.

"Though scatter prices might be more attractive, that doesn't overcome the strategic alliance you can form [in a multi-media package]," says Greg Lincoln, media director of Pillsbury Co. "That's more important than price."

According to a Bruskin Associates survey commissioned by Advertising Age and Electronic Media, 64% of respondents think packaging a TV buy with another purchase is very important or somewhat important.

"A soft market is giving impetus to media to find creative ways to do business," says Steve Levine, senior VP-executive media director at W.B. Doner & Co., Southfield, Mich. "There are fewer bucks to go around and more vehicles. Media will be letting their imaginations go and thinking of creative ways to position their products."

"It's not only a matter of economy, but of making dollars work harder," notes Pam Warren, senior VP-media director, Rubin Postaer & Associates, Los Angeles. "You want to get more impact out of the dollars you're spending today [compared with] last year or the year before."

The media recently have assembled packages they hope will satisfy customers.

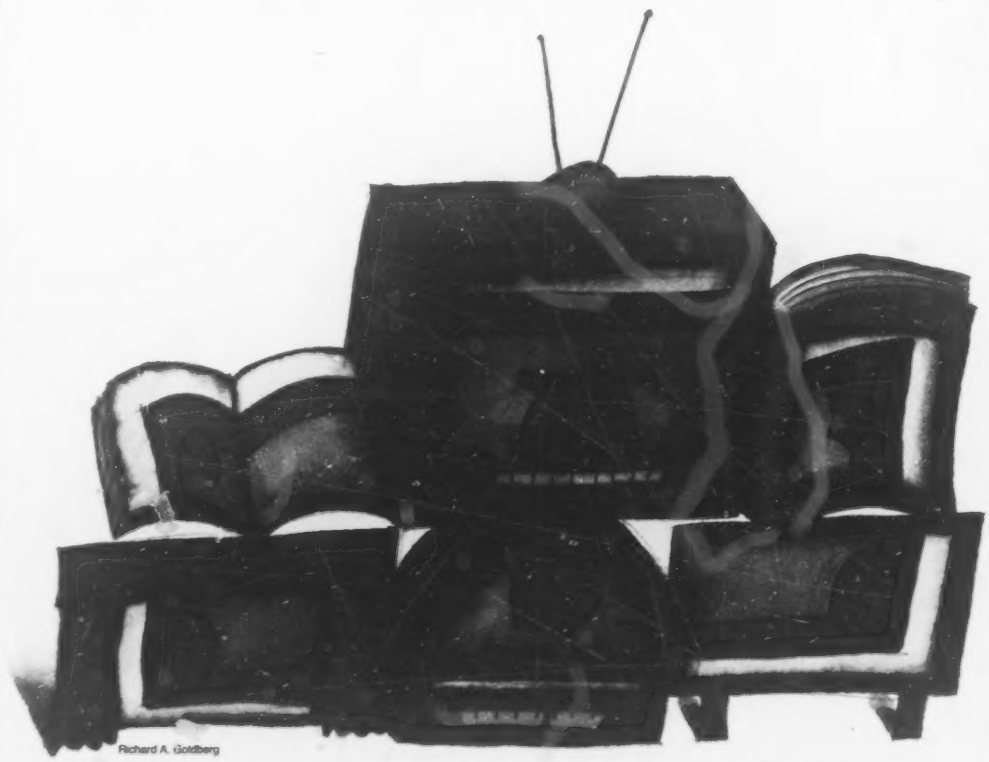
Intra-company opportunities offered by media giants such as Time Warner and Times Mirror Co. and new intercorporate links —such as those between Lifetime and Redbook, Consumer News & Business Channel and U.S. News & World Report, Financial News Network and Business Week, and Arts & Entertainment Network and several publications—signal a host of possibilities for advertisers.

Mary Ann Eger, VP-director of corporate advertising and marketing services for Citibank, says she's delighted companies are "bringing all their resources to bear in integrated marketing communications."

Multi-media deals can be "absolutely the right thing [for advertisers] to do as long as the media extensions you're going into are in harmony with the strategy and message of your campaign," she adds. "If everything is working to the same end, it can be extremely valuable."

But buyers have encountered scores of bargains in the current TV season's scatter market. These bargains have chilled some interest in multi-media deals as advertisers must choose between locking up a multi-media deal at a fixed price or gambling on being able to find similar scatter bargains in the future.

"If upfront is slow, it might unglue multi-media deals because of the fat buys available," says Jay Schoenfeld, exec VP-media director, Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York.



Richard A. Goldberg

"In an environment where you have tremendous efficiency opportunities, it will take something away from pursuing cross-media opportunities," says Mr. Levine.

In addition, as ad budgets tighten, buyers must choose whether or not to apportion sizable segments of their budgets to higher-ticket multi-media placements.

"One of the difficulties I see is committing to it," says David Verklin, senior VP-corporate media director, Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco. "It requires a firm commitment or multi-year terms. That's difficult for clients who cry out for maximum flexibility."

"Generally, advertisers are leery of long-term business unless they're very special [opportunities], like the Olympics," says Mr. Schoenfeld. "But they'll tie up their money if the deal is that good."

He says assessing the cost of a multi-media deal is much harder than simply figuring the price of a TV buy.

There's difficulty in "identifying and pinpointing price in multi-media deals," Mr. Schoenfeld says.

"How do you cost them out?" he asks. "Some of it is unquantifiable. It's different from the black and white of scatter and upfront."

Still, to safeguard prospective cross-media purchases, some buyers are looking for compensation if multi-media buys underdeliver an audience.

"We'd expect to see [audience] guarantees," says Mr. Lincoln. "Whether TV time is bought independently or linked [to a cross-media deal], it doesn't change the idea of spending money and knowing what you get for it."

"You have to build flexibility into [multi-media] deals," says Roger Morrison, director of media and programs, Eastman Kodak Co. "Guarantees are a fact of life in this business; cancellation clauses are another aspect."

According to buyers, one way sellers can circumvent reduced ad budgets is to think small when offering media packages.

Multi-media deals are not "size-limited," says Mr. Morrison. "Just scale down the size of the deal."

"There are no limits to the opportunities. One shouldn't only think big or national," concurs Mr. Levine. "There's no reason why it can't work on a local or regional basis. We don't let dollars get in the way of our thinking."

He says Doner is exploring multi-media deals for several clients. "Not mega-deals but cross-media packages, nonetheless. Some are on a small scale, but they [offer] tremendous synergistic opportunities that will bring clients more bang for the buck."

Mr. Lincoln says getting mid-scale advertisers to enter multi-media deals is the key to these packages' long-term viability as a buying option.

"It's not going to become a mainstream idea and practice until the middle-of-the-road [moderate-budget] advertisers find a way to make it work," he says. "It could take 24 months to get to the next tier of advertisers, but a soft economy will expedite things."

Pillsbury has "30 brands to advertise in a given year, and we don't have $150 million to spend with one media company," Mr. Lincoln says.

Agencies emphasize their interest in multi-media deals does not stem from an eagerness to lock in big chunks of an advertiser's budget.

"It's not an opportunity for an agency to lock in spending or a commission. That would be terribly short-sighted," says Mr. Levine. "The buy isn't over when you sign the deal."

Buyers also add they won't jump at the first multi-media opportunity that crosses their desks.

While Mr. Verklin says Riney is "in the early stages of discussions with major media companies," he adds that "we're cautious about it. We don't see the need to be first."

"I think people will get caught up putting together packages and 25% [of them] may not be what you would normally recommend to the client," says Ms. Warren. "We don't compromise our media just because it's a deal." □

How did you wind up buying television? "We were a small agency and were doing a lot of planning and buying for our accounts. When we grew, we separated the two departments and I got a little bored with the planning and moved into buying. Planning became repetitive."
What do you like most about buying TV? "You can actually see the fruits of your labor. It's a little more dramatic than print in that way. Also, [with] the negotiating involved, it's more vital for the industry, and there's a chance for growth."
What do you like least about buying TV? "The same thing: negotiating. It's fun, but sometimes it can be a pain."
If you weren't buying media, what would you rather be doing? "Selling T-shirts on a beach in Bermuda."
What do you expect for unit costs and CPMs in syndicated TV? For CPMs, a decrease of 1% to 5%. "We don't use [unit costs] as a barometer."
What do you expect for the upfront season? It will be "reasonable. In the last few years, [ratings decreases] were not justifying the increases. This year I see people realistically looking at the marketplace."
Who's holding the cards? Buyers
Did you feel the same way about last year's upfront? "No. Things were in a state of flux. The networks were very aggressive; they were forcing it on the advertisers. We're not going to deal with that this year."
Is the television audience measurement issue going to be hot or cold? "Cold. It's not an issue."
Is the audience guarantee issue going to be hot or cold? "Cold. We're going back to the traditional ways."

What's the most important issue for syndicated TV? "Tiering. Last year, a lot of stations were clearing programs—they were not committed to time periods and that affected the ratings. Advertisers couldn't guess the ratings. This year I'm hearing [from station general managers] they won't be doing that."
Which syndicator do you feel is the one to watch this year? Warner Bros.: "They have new properties that can help change the marketplace if they're successful."
What type of program is your personal favorite? "A good comedy"
What shows do you stay home to watch? "Get a Life," "In Living Color" and "Roseanne"
What shows do you regularly videotape? None
What show do you wish hadn't been canceled? "A Year in the Life" and "St. Elsewhere"
What is your current favorite syndicated show? "Jeopardy!"
How would you characterize the quality of the average syndicated show? "Just as good as the average network show. The production quality has improved. There's not as many of the name-brand people, but I think they compete qualitatively with network shows."

Crash course in buying time

Though GM's first buy sent foes scurrying, the soft scatter market now has them cooing

By Raymond Serafin

When General Motors Corp. powered its way into several large TV ad deals with CBS and NBC, observers wondered if these packages would send GM's competitors scrambling to offset the automaker's mega-budget buying clout.

Evidently, they haven't.

Fears that multi-year, big-bucks ad deals by big-spending auto marketers would shut out smaller automotive players have proved to be unfounded, at least so far.

Given the current TV economy, some now are questioning whether GM should be scrambling.

The soft TV sales market, with its plentiful, favorably priced scatter broadcast deals, has made it easier for smaller auto marketers to buy many prime-time and sports properties, biting into GM's advantage of having engineered long-term, exclusive TV deals.

"The [media] marketplace is softer now than it has been for a few years," says Jack Collins, ad manager for Nissan Motor Corp. USA's Infiniti division. "Not being committed [to long-term deals] is perhaps a good position to be in."

"To the degree that everyone but GM and Toyota [Motor Sales USA] are locked out of baseball [on CBS], it's a problem. But there are more than enough other sports available, and interest in sports [by advertisers] is declining anyway," says Tom Healey, director of media and advertising services for automotive marketing consultancy J.D. Power & Associates.

Last year, auto marketers spent almost $1.8 billion on network TV, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service.

GM has been a part of more blockbuster media deals than any other marketer. That's a reflection of both the No. 1 automaker's $1 billion media budget and also the widely known desire of Philip Guarascio, GM's executive director of advertising and marketing programs, to leverage big budgets into media spending clout.

Other automakers worried GM could shut them out when the Big 3 TV networks gave GM such a dominant media position, says Mr. Healey.

But an explosion of media choices, the expansion of the number of automotive marketers and the proliferation of niche strategies make this possibility seem less likely now.

GM's divisions all rely significantly on reaching large sales volumes for core vehicles. Accordingly, to maintain its 35% share of the market, GM's media strategy hinges on reaching a large cross-section of potential car buyers.

But other auto marketers can prosper by generating a smaller sales volume, leading them to media strategies that don't clash with GM's moves.

For instance, Nissan's Infiniti division uses network TV only for a new-product launch, such as the fourth-quarter 1990 debut of the G20, says Mr. Collins.

Its primary TV medium is spot TV in the 42 markets where Infiniti dealers currently are operating. These markets constitute about 60% of the U.S. population.

"Our costs for the purchase of all spot media, TV and radio, have been lower than anticipated," says Mr. Collins, who adds that Infiniti has put those excess funds into buying more media.

Some buyers think the media are simply looking to hook other mammoth GM-size deals.

"I think a lot of the initiatives in the mega-deals are driven just by being big," says Robert Mancini, senior VP-director of media services for J. Walter Thompson USA, Detroit, Ford Motor Co.'s Ford division agency.

"Effectiveness is coming up with a relevant idea that's driven by the marketing objective of a client and then developing a program around that," he says.

A Ford spokesman acknowledges the company is negotiating with Time Warner for a possible cross-media deal, but Ford overall hasn't been aggressive in pursuing such deals.

"We're a little bit more measured in terms of doing these types of things because we're sensitive to flexibility and we're sensitive to working from an objective," Mr. Mancini says.

Mr. Guarascio brushes off any implied criticism of the deals he's helped craft for GM.

"Believe me, we are not getting involved in deals that require us to buy things we don't want to keep. The people who are critical of the deals from that standpoint are leveling criticism based on no hard knowledge," Mr. Guarascio says.

"The mega-deals we're making provide a level of flexibility that represents progress and enhancement," he says.

Mr. Guarascio says he's pleased all of the networks have become more "innovative and imaginative" in structuring proposals. "In a lot of [previous] cases, I felt we had to take the lead there, and I'm delighted to have someone come to us with an idea."

One thing on which auto marketers agree is that it's harder to reach prospects.

Even as GM leads the way in mega-deals, it's also trying out ways of reaching highly targeted audiences. It's one of six national advertisers taking part in Turner Broadcasting System's upcoming test of Airport Channel, aimed at viewers waiting at airline departure gates. And GM is the first title sponsor of the U.S. Armed Forces Sports Championships, which is expected to have strong penetration into the military community.

While some mass purchases will continue to thrive, Mr. Mancini says the overall trend will favor niche media that can deliver target groups.

"People are spending more time with the media relevant to their particular lifestyles, and the key in marketing will be to focus on the lifestyles of the people most likely to buy your product," he says.

In fact, Mr. Mancini believes mega-deals won't play a significant role during the rest of the 1990s. Flexibility and selectivity will increasingly drive media strategies during the decade, and mega-deals are usually too broad-based to achieve those goals, he says.

"Clients are going to want to change with the changing conditions in the marketplace," says Mr. Mancini, pointing to NBC's decline in prime-time ratings during the 1990-91 season. "That's a major change in the marketplace, and you need flexibility to move with that."

His conclusion: The mega-deals trend "will be short-lived." □

BY THE BUY: SPOT

Name: Nanci Gray Schwartz
Title, agency: VP-media buying, broadcast negotiator, J. Walter Thompson USA, New York
Years in current position: 13
Years in media department: 20
How did you wind up buying TV? "I started in billing and it was a natural thing to evolve into. At the time, it was a very good opportunity for a woman."
What do you like most about buying TV? "It's challenging, especially today. It's hard, because there's never the same formula, it's constantly changing."
What do you like least about buying TV? "The drudge side: bills, checking contracts."
If you weren't buying media, what would you rather be doing? "I'd go to law school and become a lawyer. And I adore animals. I'd like to own a grooming shop."
What do you expect for unit costs and CPMs in spot TV? No change. "Everything is spread thinner; it's more complicated. Costs are down, so they should be lower, but you're not getting much of a rating, so it evens out."

N. Gray Schwartz

What do you expect for the upfront season? It'll be "quiet. I can't envision anything that's going to make a difference. There's no new [ad] category. A few years back, jeans came in heavy and were filling up the air. I don't see anything that's going to make a difference now."
Who's holding the cards? Buyers
Did you feel the same way about last year's upfront? Yes
Is the TV audience measurement issue going to be hot or cold? Cold
Is the audience guarantee issue going to be hot or cold? Cold
What's the most important issue for spot TV? "Costs. I don't know the answer. It needs less costly programming but better ratings. It's a terrible problem. It needs constant new programming, but costs are so high they can't maintain the prices they need to support it. Summer ratings drop to the floor, and it's worse now, because cable and VCRs are so strong. To add further to this problem, innovative, highly rated programming is on the hit list of many clients so the buyer can't include these shows as a part of the mix, even if they are cost-effective. But I just don't know what they can do [about this]."
Which local station do you feel is the one to watch this year? "In New York, WABC is dominant, but WCBS seems to be getting stronger in this market."
What type of program is your favorite? News and sports: "I love football."
What shows do you try to stay home and watch? "Jeopardy!"
What show do you regularly videotape? None
What show do you wish hadn't been canceled? None. "I'm a bridge player, so I'm always running off to play bridge."
What is your favorite broadcast show this season? "The Simpsons": "It's very clever." Also, "60 Minutes" and "Murder, She Wrote."
Characterize the quality of the average local TV program: "Pretty good [in New York] compared with elsewhere."

BY THE BUY: NETWORK

Name: Jon Mandel
Title, agency: senior VP-director of national broadcast, Grey Advertising, New York
Years in current position: 14
Years in media department: 16
How did you wind up buying TV? "I was in media planning at Grey and had a major fight with an account person. I went to my boss and said, 'My first fist fight was in [grade school], with Robby Powers over Monica Freid, and I'm about to have my second one. Could you find something else for me to do?' And she did."
What do you like most about buying TV? "The people in the business. Not just the people who work with me but the people at the networks, the cable networks and even my competitors. I don't think there's another business with such a high percentage of good people and a low percentage of schmucks."
What do you like least about buying TV? "If you do the job right, you're running on the edge of doing it wrong. Getting clients the best conceivable deal is a juggling act. If we make a mistake here, you're talking about a $100,000 mistake. If you make a mistake in non-broadcast media, it isn't as large and you have a lot more time to fix it. That's the edge. To do the job right, you have to go right to the precipice. You consume a lot of Maalox on this job."

Jon Mandel

If you weren't buying media, what would you rather be doing? "Something completely different. I still don't know what. That's why I'm still buying media."
What do you expect for unit costs and CPMs in network TV? "There will be decreases, and not just in network."
What do you expect for the upfront season? "To relax, I go out on my boat and catch bluefish. If the networks make my boat sit in the slip all summer, my cost-per-pound of fish is going to go up to the supermarket price. If the networks are realistic, the cost-per-pound of fish I catch will go down. . . . The year I bought my summer house was the year this [upfront buying] business went into the summer. If the networks are realistic [with prices in negotiations], I can enjoy [my summer]. If not, I'll have to take up snow skiing."
Who's holding the cards? Buyers
Did you feel the same way about last year's upfront? No. "Last year it was about even between buyers and sellers. But there's no such thing as a 'must-buy' any more."
Is the TV audience measurement issue going to be hot or cold? "Cold—and it should be."
Is the audience guarantee issue going to be hot or cold? "I don't consider it an issue and never did consider it an issue."
What's the most important issue for network TV? "The networks for too long have been taking in money and not making [buyers] aware of their values. They have excellent price-per-value relationships. Because of short staffing they haven't been able to get this message out to the junior planning people and the clients."
Which network is the one to watch this year? "For the first time since TV was in black and white, you can't pick just one to watch. It's a wonderful situation for advertisers, buyers and the viewing public. There really are four viable, interesting networks."
What type of program is your personal favorite? "I'm a TV slut. I watch it all, although I wish my wife would quit watching 'Murder, She Wrote.' "
What show do you try to stay home and watch? The local news on WNYW, New York. "I don't see any of my commercials. It's the only time I can watch and relax."
What show do you regularly videotape? "I'm one of those few people who doesn't have to deal with a videocassette machine. If I want to see something, I can just call my salesman."
What show do you wish hadn't been canceled? " 'China Beach,' before it went downhill."
What is your current favorite network TV show? "Get a Life"
Characterize the quality of the average network TV show: "On syndication, network and cable, there are a lot of very good shows and a few very excellent shows, but more horrible shows. It's a function of the sheer number of hours [of programming to fill]. It's easy to say something's terrible because you get lost in the forest. Unfortunately, because of the number of hours, you don't see the trees for the forest."

Linda Urben, corporate manager-broadcast media, AT&T Co.

Being skeptical upfront: "We're looking for things that will attract the upwardly mobile male audience because they're big decision makers in our business. So things like late-night TV work for us.

Linda Urben

"But we go into the upfront with a conviction that there is nothing we absolutely have to have. We look at everything from a zero base: What can it do for us to meet our objectives?

"Diversity seems to be the name of the game to hedge against what might continue to be a soft market. There are all kinds of different shows in the works: Reality shows seem to be popular, comedies about sisters and mothers . . . and deep lists of movies."

Scatter on the rise: "The industry is probably going to be more conservative in this upfront market because some folks were burned in the '90-91 upfront.

"Scatter might be used a little more next year, as folks get budgets back. But there have been budget cuts, there is a recession and folks are looking to get more bang for the buck [and] diversifying their use of advertising and promotion dollars.

"The prime-time TV folks are going to have to work harder to get their piece of the pie, and their programming will have to be eye-catching."

Title, agency: senior VP-national broadcast, Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco
Years in current position: 3
Years in media department: 15
How did you wind up buying TV? "I was a news writer and reporter who saw that the only way to make money in television was in front of the camera or on the buying side."
What do you like most about buying TV? "Television changes all the time. I [started buying for Ogilvy & Mather] in 1977-78, so I've only known declining network shares."

Douglas Seay

What do you like least about buying TV? "I don't like it when it gets big and bureaucratic. When I worked at Ogilvy & Mather I was a workhorse buyer. It was huge money [accounts], but with small accounts your input is better appreciated. And often, [buying] is more creative in small accounts. I want to be respected by the [client's] salespeople. My report card comes from my clients."
If you weren't buying media, what would you rather be doing? "I'd rather be a bond trader. It's not much different."
What do you expect for unit costs and CPMs in syndicated TV? Both will hold steady or decrease. "I'm not sure anyone knows what the real answer is. If buying TV is like investing, I'd rather convert to all cash and wait and see what happens. I wouldn't invest in anything right now."
What do you expect for the upfront season? It'll be "volatile and unpredictable. The war is over, but no one knows what the implications are. Interest rates are down and the feds are holding off. There's no secret formula."
Who's holding the cards? Buyers, with the exception of children's programming.
Did you feel the same way about last year's upfront? No. "The sellers were stronger last year. You know how markets are supposed to work on supply and demand? They say, 'Because demand is off, pricing should be flat.' But, in fact, if demand is off, pricing should be lower. They just won't say the words. It would be heresy to their managers. They'll probably say it's 'negative increases.' "
Is the TV audience measurement issue going to be hot or cold? "Cold. While the networks are jostling numbers, buyers are hedging their bets prior to the outcome."
Is the audience guarantee issue going to be hot or cold? "Hot. Everyone wants a guarantee. It may not be fair, but if they're going to offer it, I'm going to take advantage of it."
What's the most important issue for syndicated TV? "Accountability: ease of paper work [and] an easy system of [determining] what exactly ran."
Which syndicator is the one to watch this year? Television Program Enterprises: "They're always an interesting one because they're mainstream. They're a good barometer for the industry."
What type of program is your personal favorite? Dramas
What show do you stay home to watch? "Law & Order": "It's the best produced, acted and directed show on TV now."
What show do you regularly videotape? " 'Entertainment Tonight,' like people videotape the news."
What show do you wish hadn't been canceled? "Alien Nation"
What is your current favorite show in syndication? "Star Trek: The Next Generation"
Characterize the quality of the average syndicated show: "Too broad-based," in that syndicators are trying to please too many people at once. "The top end is as good as any, but it quickly drops [and becomes] crummy."

Bob Springer, senior director-advertising services, RJR Nabisco

Daytime dilemma: The upfront market for the daytime TV slot is "another strange one; there's no such thing as business-as-usual.

"I don't see any reason why it's not going to be a soft market.

Bob Springer

"It's really hard for an agency to keep a client if they invest in upfront and then find it selling significantly cheaper in the scatter marketplace. That's just not smart.

"The networks I'm sure will try something to artificially inflate the market, throw up some kind of a smoke screen, which I think they're prone to do. Last year they seized on the lower [persons using television] levels in February to kind of obscure the negotiating process. We're certainly waiting to see what that issue will be this year.

"[But] I think the networks are looking at a situation where a lot of advertisers will hold back their money for scatter unless the networks come to them with some deals that they're willing to gamble on to be upfront.

"If a network came to us with a good CPM change—and in some cases that would have to be a good decrease—then we might be inclined to commit heavily upfront.

"If the networks come out bullish as they do looking for CPM increases or even the same CPMs in some dayparts, we'd be inclined to hold a significant portion of our money for scatter."

CPM tumble: Large CPM hikes in daytime "would be ludicrous given the marketplace and the economy. This is not the year for CPM increases.

"Daytime holds up. It's stable, so I don't really anticipate any exorbitant CPM increases, but there probably will be some on the plus side, [in the] single digits."

Scatter scarcity: "There's not a lot to buy in scatter for daytime; you have to get it upfront if you want the quality time." The overall economy will prevent the networks from boosting prices in light of steady upfront demand, he says.

'Nothing to watch'

'Nobody waiting in line' for many shows; buyers urge nets to revamp profane lineup

By Jon Krampner

Media buyers and marketing executives are just like the general public: They're all prone to scream, "There's nothing good on TV!"

According to a Bruskin Associates survey commissioned by Advertising Age and Electronic Media, buyers and advertisers generally are unimpressed by today's TV shows.

The survey found 64% of respondents feel overall TV programming quality is fair, and another 8% describe it as poor. Only 27% think it's good, and not a single respondent characterizes it as excellent.

Respondents also say program quality is the issue TV media executives should address first.

A total of 43% of respondents cite quality as the priority issue, placing it far ahead of the 23% mentioning ad costs and the 21% saying ad clutter. Audience measurement, the barnburner issue of last year's TV season, is cited by only 13% of respondents as the top issue.

Like the viewing public, buyers express continuing concern over language and promiscuity in TV shows.

Although only 23% of survey respondents feel there was more violence on TV in the 1990-91 season than in the previous season, 52% feel there was more sex and profanity in programming, voicing particular concern over language on shows.

"A little girl saying something off-color to her father is not family viewing," says Una Barden, senior VP-associate media director, national television buying, BBDO Worldwide, New York. "Our clients don't want a negative against their company."

There were several cases "where the networks suffered because advertisers did not want to appear in some of these shows," says Betsy Frank, senior VP-director of television information and new media, Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York.

In fact, according to the Advertising Age/Electronic Media survey, 66% of respondents say they avoid buying shows considered too sexual or profane.

This observation, coupled with the weak ad market, meant "there was nobody waiting in line to go into [these shows]," Ms. Frank says.

Although Ms. Frank says TV profanity and sex have increased in general, the canceled Fox Broadcasting Co. show "DEA" was the most constant offender. Programming executives at the Big 3 and Fox were unavailable for comment.

Although the networks feel the heat about gratuitous sex, violence and profanity, cable and syndication sometimes can be worse offenders, says Charles Bachrach, senior VP-director of network and programming, Rubin Postaer & Associates, Los Angeles. USA Network and Turner Network Television have "good-quality shows but they have racy subject matter," he says.

> "A little girl saying something off-color to her father is not family viewing."

Although Greg Moyer, senior VP-programming group at The Discovery Channel, disputes this observation about cable, he applauds advertisers' concerns over program content.

"I think advertisers are telling programmers that it's no longer a laissez-faire system, that we are responsible to know what our shows are about and the messages they send out," he says. "I welcome that new sense of social responsibility."

While buyers and marketers generally agree deficiencies in TV programming need to be addressed, they have a range of recommendations on how to correct the shortcomings.

Mr. Bachrach realizes it's difficult to create shows that both appeal to viewers and won't cause concern among some advertisers.

"If you make programming more congenial [to advertisers], it becomes pap and uninteresting and no one watches it," he says. "On the other hand, when networks address issues and subject matters that the pressure groups don't like, there are good ratings and people tend to tune in, but the advertisers bail out."

The happy medium, Mr. Bachrach says, is for programmers to tackle controversial social issues, but without injecting unnecessary sex or violence.

" 'Doogie Howser, M.D.' had a wonderful show about AIDS," he says. " 'A Different World' also talked about AIDS in a very educational and enlightening way. It was well-produced, got the point across and wasn't offensive. Advertisers should be proud to be in shows like that." Mr. Bachrach placed spots for Rubin Postaer client American Honda Motor Co. on the "A Different World" episode.

Ms. Frank says programmers could start by fixating less on the funny bone.

"The networks are all at least giving lip service to the need for more diversity of programming," she says.

According to the Advertising Age/Electronic Media survey, sitcoms rank No. 4 on a list of 10 programming types respondents say they prefer. With 23% of respondents saying they prefer sitcoms, the genre finished behind sports with 32%, movies with 25% and news programs with 24%. Sitcoms did finish ahead of their primary prime-time competitor dramas, which 21% of respondents say they prefer.

Buyers pilot course for fall hot spots

Feel lucky? Try playing the lottery. Or try picking next TV season's hits, given only hints out of network program development meetings.

Here are the pilots several media buyers feel have the potential to distinguish themselves this upcoming TV season. Since these picks were made only from snippets given at development meetings in March, the buyers below emphasize they wouldn't bet next month's rent or mortgage on their choices.

"Esme's Little Nap," a CBS sitcom starring Debbie Reynolds, whose daughter Carrie Fisher is co-executive producer.

"Carrie Fisher is so off-the-wall. If you watched the movie 'Postcards From the Edge' or read her book, you know she has a delightful and insightful way of writing."

"The Brave New World of Charlie Hoover," a Fox sitcom starring Tim Matheson, with Sam Kinison as his 6-inch-tall alter ego.

"Tim Matheson's an average kind of guy, and here's Sam. If Sam were his normal height and weight, I think you'd be put off by it. But he's like the bad angel on the shoulder.

"He can be even funnier in a 6-inch size, and you can put up with him."

"The Adventures of Mark and Brian," an NBC comedy featuring two Los Angeles disc jockeys, Mark Thompson and Brian Phelps.

"I have the feeling that Mark and Brian are strange enough that they may cross over."

Lou Bullock, program services manager, BBDO Worldwide, New York

"Lakota Moon," a Fox drama focusing on the Sioux Indians in the Old West.

"It's a period of history that people are fascinated with, but it's taken from the Indians' point of view. It's a socially conscious show that may try to change people's opinions about how the Indians were treated."

Animated shows such as "Capital Critters" (ABC), "Fish Police" (CBS) and "Wayneheads" (Fox).

Mr. Bullock thinks these have potential but cautions, "Given the problems [Fox] had just getting 'The Simpsons' on the air, will [the networks] be able to put out a quality product and sustain concepts and producing higher-quality shows?

"What we want is for the networks . . . to get reputable production companies on board—the [producer Steven] Bochcos of the world, the Jim Burrowses—and have them do pilots," Ms. Barden says.

Ms. Frank also suggests networks institute a more formal second season.

"Now the networks introduce all the shows during the same two weeks of the year," she says. TV viewers are bombarded with so many new shows in a short period it makes it difficult for a show to attract and develop an audience, Ms. Frank says.

By introducing fewer new shows in the fall and breaking more in the second season, "viewers would not be quite as confused by so many new shows being thrown up in front of them."

One buyer suggests the networks refrain from prematurely axing critically acclaimed but slow-building shows.

"They should stay with the good shows a bit longer and give them more than a six-week or seven-week trial, even if they have low ratings," says Don Cole, senior VP-media director, W.B. Doner & Co., Baltimore.

He says eventual hits "Hill Street Blues" and "St. Elsewhere" initially pulled low ratings. Although he says it's not as good as "Hill Street Blues," Mr. Cole says ABC's "Eddie Dodd" may get bounced before it should.

Whether programmers find the elusive ingredients that will bring them high ratings and ad sales remains to be seen, especially given the public's unpredictable viewing behavior.

"We thought [last year's schedule] looked aggressive, that it was a schedule designed to lure some of those fickle viewers back to network television. But there were no hits," says Ms. Frank.

But, she notes, the networks' offerings for next season appear to be more in tune with cultivating their core audiences.

In the just-completed season, "CBS seemed to be focusing on getting younger audiences through shows like 'Uncle Buck,' but now they're focusing more on mature female audiences," Ms. Frank says. "The networks have done more to pinpoint on their strengths." □

"Esme's Little Nap."

"It has a proven star in Debbie Reynolds, who plays an off-base kind of heroine. It could catch on; CBS has proven itself adept at these female-oriented, sophisticated comedies."

"Grey Guns," a CBS drama starring Wilford Brimley and Richard Farnsworth as policemen in a Rocky Mountain resort town.

"There's terrific chemistry between those two. The contrast between the yuppie town and the old lawmen will be interesting."

"Man of the People," an NBC drama starring James Garner as a con man turned city councilman.

"James Garner is a recognized star. It was smart to sign him up."

LET'S BE UPFRONT

Dick Hobbs, senior VP-media services, Leo Burnett Co., Chicago.

Prime-time bull market: "Certainly if the recession is over and the economy were to make big strides forward, that could have a positive influence from the sellers' standpoint on the upfront. But I'm not sure I believe things have turned around."

Dick Hobbs

Put it in writing: "Prime-time audience guarantees are very important.

"We're looking for a continuation of audience guarantees in the traditional fashion, straight on with Nielsen [Media Research data] and without any of these potential adjustments that were discussed last year. We're a firm believer in the people-meter system.

"The decline of [network TV viewing] audiences has been a fact of life, and one has to buy around it.

"There's erosion in all day-parts. I'm not sure whether the percentage of erosion is greater in prime time, but it might be."

BY THE BUY: CABLE

Name: Susan Ware
Title, agency: Network program supervisor, DDB Needham Worldwide, New York
Years in current position: 2
Years in media department: 15
How did you wind up buying TV? "I started as an assistant buyer and planner, and was at [New York-based media buying service] Clifford A. Botway Inc. doing print buying, and Needham had an opening, so I went there."

Susan Ware

What do you like most about buying TV? "TV is very dynamic. There are so many alternatives."
What do you like least about buying TV? "Sometimes it's too complicated. There are too many cable salespeople and so many cable channels. Every time one changes management, everyone's new and you have to get to know them all over again."
If you weren't buying media, what would you rather be doing? "In college I wanted to be a marine biologist, but I'd rather be fishing. A couple of my friends and I kid around that we're going to open a pizza parlor."
What do you expect for unit costs and CPMs in cable? Flat to a 1% to 5% increase at most. "There will be major adjustments with network this year, so cable should be flat."
What do you expect for the upfront season? It'll be "long and arduous. With network setting the tone for everyone, cable should not be quite so hard-nosed, although they might be. Our experience is that [cable] pricing should be in a certain place, but we don't necessarily share that point of view with the people who are selling it. National syndication's a funky mess . . . cable is still strong this year. I have this feeling sometimes that the cable networks are going to really ram it to us. It will be interesting dealing with CNN."
Who's holding the cards? Buyers: "We all have a similar mentality this year."
Did you feel the same way about last year's upfront? "Yes, but buyers may have more [clout] than last year. Even if the cable networks are going to be tougher, I think the buyers will still hold the cards."
Is the TV audience measurement issue going to be hot or cold? Cold
Is the audience guarantee issue going to be hot or cold? Cold
What's the most important issue for cable? "I think the thing we're most worried about is the measurement issue."
Which cable network is the one to watch this year? Arts & Entertainment Network: "They tend to adjust their schedule like a broadcast network; a lot of strategy goes into trying to make their network appealing. They're trying to do exciting things."
What type of program is your personal favorite? Mysteries
What show do you stay home to watch? "L.A. Law"
What shows do you regularly videotape? "None. I don't have time to watch them anymore."
What show do you wish hadn't been cancelled? "ALF"
What is your current favorite cable show? A&E's "Agatha Christie Mysteries"
Characterize the quality of the average cable show: "It's equal to network programming. The cable networks are really making an effort to provide high quality."

BY THE BUY: CABLE

Name: Suzanne Shawn
Title, agency: Senior VP-national broadcast media, Lintas:Campbell-Ewald, Detroit
Years in current position: 1
Years in media department: 9
How did you wind up buying TV? "I was hired by Campbell-Ewald in 1982 to explore new technologies—cable."

Suzanne Shawn

What do you like most about buying TV? "I like the challenges of it. I also like being part of the beginnings of cable and witnessing it grow, but knowing that it's still evolving."
What do you like least about buying TV? "The upkeep and the maintenance. It's a laborious task."
If you weren't buying media, what would you rather be doing? "You know, I never even thought about it. I'm doing what I want to do."
What do you expect for unit costs and CPMs in cable? CPMs will hold stable. "It's a buyer's market. There's going to be less money available in the marketplace."
What do you expect for the upfront season? "I think the cable [upfront] marketplace will follow the networks' season. The networks will set the tone, and I think they'll cut good deals with advertisers. This will have a residual effect on cable, and it'll be difficult for cable to be that aggressive [on pricing] if advertisers get these great deals."

Who's holding the cards? Buyers
Did you feel the same way about last year's upfront? No. "This year, the economy is a key factor."
What's the most important issue for cable? Inventory control: "Several networks have a way to go before they know what they have to sell."
Which cable network is the one to watch this year? Turner Network Television: "Especially if they can expand on their original productions, which are excellent. They've already got terrific movies and the National Basketball Association."
What type of program is your personal favorite? "I don't watch a lot of TV. I'm a light viewer."
What show do you try to stay home and watch? "L.A. Law"
What is your current favorite cable show? "L.A. Law" on Lifetime Characterize the quality of the average cable show: "A lot of cable TV shows are off-network series, so they're the same as network TV. But the original programming is terrific. That's what they're concentrating on; they're on par with anything."

—Junu Bryan Kim

BY THE BUY: SYNDIE

Name: Steve Auerbach
Title, agency: senior VP-director of network programming, Ally & Gargano, New York
Years in current position: 5
Years in media department: 15
How did you wind up buying TV? "I was in the network television research department at Ted Bates. It evolved into an assistant buyer's job."

Steve Auerbach

What do you like most about buying TV? "It's program-oriented, rather than spot TV, where you're buying a daypart rotation. Also, it's more 'show-bizzy' than other media. It's less that now, but in the beginning, that was a fun aspect. You got to go places and rub shoulders with the famous and not-so-famous."
What do you like least about buying TV? "It's becoming less relationship-oriented and more pocketbook-oriented. It used to be a closed business. You saw the same people over and over, and you could get some favors. It was an 'I'll rub your back if you rub mine' situation."
If you weren't buying media, what would you rather be doing? "Sitting in a yacht, having someone sail it around the world for me. I'd find the best golf course on an island, get off and play a few rounds and get back on again."
What do you expect for unit costs and CPMs in syndicated TV? No change or a decrease of up to 5% in costs and CPMs: "That's how it should be. The talk is less money in the upfront marketplace, and as an incentive to get the money in, the syndicators have to lower their prices."
What do you expect for the upfront season? Because of the economy, "it will be a buyer's market. Those two words haven't been uttered in a long, long time."
Who's holding the cards? Buyers
Did you feel the same way about last year's upfront? No: "It's been a seller's market for a long time."
Is the TV audience measurement issue going to be hot or cold? Cold
Is the audience guarantee issue going to be hot or cold? Cold: "There are going to be regular guarantees. Syndicators have already said that."
What's the most important issue for syndicated TV? "The syndicators must relate to the buyer's realistic rating estimates. We try to build 'recapturable inventory'—make-good inventory that's allocated at the time the buy is ordered—so we don't find ourselves 20% behind later. If the syndicator delivers the guaranteed rating, then they can take the inventory and sell it. Otherwise, it can be used as a make-good."
Which syndicator is the one to watch this year? Paramount Television Group: "They've got 'The Maury Povich Show,' 'The Arsenio Hall Show' and 'The Party Machine with Nia Peeples.' They're giving their shows a chance to succeed and coming up with fresh, successful products. You could say King World is the strongest; they have been, income-wise, but they've been riding on 'Wheel of Fortune,' 'Jeopardy!' and 'The Oprah Winfrey Show' for the last umpteen years. They'll say, 'Look at "Inside Edition," ' but it isn't that strong. They generate more income, but their shows will get tired."
What type of program is your personal favorite? News and sports programming
What shows do you try to stay home and watch? " '60 Minutes,' if anything, but I usually don't."
What shows do you regularly videotape? None: "I haven't figured out how to yet."
What show do you wish hadn't been canceled? The original "Star Trek"
What is your current favorite syndicated TV show? "Jeopardy!"
Characterize the quality of the average syndicated TV show: "I worked for a syndication company 15 years ago. But it's a different generation now, and it's 1,000% better than it used to be. . . . In the early days, they had two or three talk shows and the rest were reruns. There was no original programming. The packagers wouldn't have the balls to deficit-spend. But it's matured."

TV? "Daytime. Some dayparts are so boring, depending on the mix of the dayparts you have."
If you weren't buying media, what would you rather be doing? "I'd be a travel agent and do a lot of traveling."
What do you expect for unit costs and CPMs in spot TV? No change. "They should stay the same until the second quarter of '92 with the Olympics and elections. But if the recession ends, an increase [of 1% to 2%] might hit in the fourth quarter of '91."
What do you expect for the upfront season? "We're busy, but I don't anticipate huge [price] jumps. . . . A lot depends on the accounts you have at the time. One category that's still active is automotive, for example, despite the cutbacks."
Who's holding the cards? Buyers
Did you feel the same way about last year's upfront? Yes: "The last few years we've had more weight."
Is the TV audience measurement issue going to be hot or cold? Cold
Is the audience guarantee issue going to be hot or cold? "There's an understanding between buyers and sellers that any big variations are taken care of in-flight. There's no written guarantee—you either accept it, or you don't. If there's fall-off you expect compensation."
What's the most important issue for spot TV? Ad costs: "All clients are concerned with that now."
Which local station do you feel is the one to watch this year? "It's hard to say. It really depends on the strength of the local news."
What type of program is your personal favorite? "Sitcoms, but I'm very picky."
What show do you stay home to watch? "Murphy Brown"
What show do you regularly videotape? Movies, but no regular series.
What show do you wish hadn't been canceled? "Barney Miller"
What is your current favorite show? "Murphy Brown"
Characterize the quality of the average local spot show: "The stations that have the great news operations are usually the great ones locally. The problem is, there's a big difference between programming in a market like New York and a market like Utica."

LET'S BE UPFRONT

Robert Ward, director of advertising services, Miller Brewing Co.

Spot selection: "We renewed all our major sports properties [baseball and professional basketball and football] and locked up multiyear deals on each of those properties at pricing we thought was favorable. Obviously the networks thought it was favorable to them.

"But I think audience guarantees will continue to be a vital component of the marketplace."

More bang for the bucks: "There are perhaps better opportunities to get value out of your relationship with the networks than simply squeezing every last 5¢ out of them and playing the scatter market. We're seeing really positive signs of the networks becoming more like marketers; a recent example would be a program we've initiated with NBC where Miller Lite was featured within the promotional announcements NBC runs for its prime-time lineup.

"That kind of partnership is something that the networks [have been slow in coming up with,] but I think the opportunity has arrived. It's not just simply who can sell it for the lowest price," but who offers creative ways to develop value-added packages to stretch the money spent, he says.

BY THE BUY: SPOT

Name: Dorothy Swerdlick
Title, agency: VP-director of spot TV broadcast, Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York
Years in current position: 3
Years in media department: 16
How did you wind up buying TV? "I started in what was called billing and estimating at the time and then moved into the media department, working on one account doing budgets and allocations. Sixteen years ago, there was an opportunity to move into [TV buying]. It seemed interesting, and there was more growth potential."

Dorothy Swerdlick

What do you like most about buying TV? "It's a very complicated arena. It's constantly changing one way or another; there's always a new nuance. And I'm a people person, so I like that aspect of it."
What do you like least about buying TV? "There's nothing about it I don't like."
If you weren't buying media, what would you rather be doing? "Sitting on the beach in the Bahamas or winning the lottery and traveling around the world."
